I. Abiathar, in consideration of his old services, is only degraded, v. 26, 27. Solomon convicts him; but calls to mind the respect he had formerly showed his father, and that he had both ministered to him in holy things, and also tenderly sympathized with him in his afflictions, particularly when in exile and distress, both by Saul's persecution, and Absalom's rebellion. Note, Those that show kindness to God's people, shall have it remembered to their advantage, one time or other. For this reason, he spares his life, but deposes him, and confines him to his country-seat at Anathoth, forbids him the court, the city, the tabernacle, the altar, and all intermeddling in public business, with an intimation likewise, that he was on his good behavior, and that though not put to death, at this time, he might be, another time, if he did not conduct himself well. Saul, for a supposed crime, had barbarously destroyed Abiathar's father, and 85 priests, their families, and city; Solomon spares Abiathar, though guilty of a real crime: thus was Saul's government ruined, and Solomon's established. As men are to God's ministers, so they will find Him to them. The depriving of Abiathar was the fulfilling of the threatening against the house of Eli, (1 Sam. 2: 30.) for he was the last high priest of that family. It was now above 80 years, since the ruin was

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 10—25. It is very happy for a nation, when the death of one good king is followed by the peaceable succession of another, equally wise and righteous. But men are not duly thankful for these blessings: and therefore the Lord permits their course to be interrupted; that public calamities, experienced or dreaded, may promote humiliation for sin, fervency in prayer, and general reformation; and make way for more lively gratitude, when they are removed or prevented. On such great emergencies, wisdom is needful to direct Christians, that they may neither neglect their present duty, nor intermeddle out of their proper sphere.—Ambitious men can never rest; they must continually be aiming to disturb the settled order and public peace, that they may mount to superior authority; and when baffled with one weapon, they make trial of another.—The duty of honoring parents is obligatory upon us in every station in life; and too much respect and gratitude cannot be shown them, provided they be not gratified by unlawful and improper compliances: but no relative affection, no engagement whatever, can bind us to do a thing that is evil, or of bad tendency to the public.—The machinations of crafty men generally entangle themselves, and involve them in mischiefs which simple, upright men escape. (Ps. 125: 4, 5.) No government can be secure, whilst they, who aim to subvert it, remain unpunished: and such as have been convicted, and still persist in treasonable designs, are proper persons to be sacrificed for the public good, and for an example to others; for apparent severity to them may eventually be mercy to thousands. SCOTT

Verses 23—25.

Solomon has been censured, as too severe and precipitate in this execution; but there is no intimation of this in the Scripture. Nor would sound policy admit of any delay. SCOTT.

Verses 26, 27.

Solomon's language to Abiathar, and his silence, clearly prove, that some recent conspiracies had been formed. In deposing Abiathar, Solomon purposely intended to fulfil the word of God to Eli. (36—46. 2 Sam. 14:28, 29.) The entire subjection of the priests, and even of the high priest, to the kings of Israel, in all civil and political concerns, is clearly shown in this instance: nor is any exemption from capital punishment, in the case of treason, or other crimes deserving which he spake concerning the house of Eli in [r] Shiloh.

28 ¶ Then tidings came to Joab; for [s] Joab had turned after Adonijah, though he turned not after Absalom. And Joab fled unto the tabernacle of the LORD, and [t] caught hold on the horns of the altar.

29 And it was told king Solomon that Joab was fled unto the tabernacle of the LORD; and behold, he is by the altar. Then Solomon sent Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, saying, [u] Go, fall upon him.

30 And Benaiah came to the tabernacle of the LORD, and said unto him, Thus saith the king, Come forth. And he said, Nay; but I will die here. And Benaiah brought the king word again, saying, Thus said Joab, and thus he answered me.

31 And the king said unto him, [x] Do as he hath said, and fall upon him, and bury him; that thou [y] mayest take away the innocent blood, which Joab shed, from me, and [z] from the house of my father.

32 And the LORD shall [a] return his blood upon his own head, who fell upon [b] two men [c] more righteous and better than he, and slew them with the sword, [d] my father David not knowing thereof, to wit, Abner the son of Ner, captain of the host of Israel, and Amasa the son of [e] Jether, captain of the host of Judah.

33 Their blood shall therefore return [f] upon the head of Joab, and upon the head of his seed for ever: but [g] upon David, and upon his seed, and [h] upon his house, and upon his throne, shall there be peace for ever from the LORD.

threatened; God's judgments, though not executed speedily, will be executed surely.

II. Joab, in consideration of his old sins, is put to death.

1. His guilty conscience sent him to the horns of the altar. He heard Adonijah was executed, and Abiathar deposed; therefore, fearing his turn would be next, he flies for refuge to the altar. Some think he designed thereby to devote himself for the future to a constant attendance on the altar, hoping by this to obtain his pardon: as some that have lived a dissolute life, all their days, have thought to atone for it, by retiring into a monastery when old, leaving the world when it has left them.

2. Solomon orders him to be put to death there for the murder of Abner and Amasa; for these are the crimes on which he thought fit to ground the sentence, rather than on his treasonable adherence to Adonijah. Solomon would have pardoned his offence against himself, (for clemency gives great reputation and establishment to an infant government,) and would have only displaced him, as he did Abiathar; but he must die for the murders he had formerly been guilty of, for which his father had charged him to call him to an account. On this he grounds the sentence, aggravating the crime, v. 32. Wo to the head that lies under the guilt of blood! The seed of such evil doers shall never be renowned. Joab resolved not to stir from the altar, (v. 30.) hoping thereby either to secure himself, or else to render Solomon odious to the people, if he should put him to death there. Benaiah made a scruple of either killing him there, or dragging him thence; but Solomon knew the law, that the altar of God should give no protection to wilful murderers; (Ex. 21: 14.) Thou shalt take him from mine altar, that he may die, may die a sacrifice. In case of such sins, as the blood of beasts would atone for, the altar was a refuge, but not in Joab's case; he therefore orders him to be executed there, if he would not be got thence, to show that he feared not the censure of the people in doing his duty, but would rectify their mistake, and let them know that the administration of justice is better than sacrifice, and that the holiness of any place should never countenance the wickedness of any person. Benaiah slew him, (v. 34.) with the solemnity, no doubt, of a public execution. The law being thus satisfied, he was buried in his own house in the wilderness, privately, like a criminal, not pompously, like a soldier; yet no indignity is done to his dead body; it is not for man to lay iniquity on the bones, whatever God does.

Lastly, Solomon pleases himself with this act of justice, not as it gratified any personal revenge, but as it fulfilled his father's orders, and was a real kindness to himself and his own government.

V. 35—46. Here is,

I. The preferment of Benaiah and Zadok, two faithful friends to Solomon and his government v. 35. Benaiah to be general of the forces, and Zadok high priest; and therein was fulfilled that word of God, when He threatened to cut off the house of Eli, 1 Sam. 2: 35. No wonder a king,[4] so immediately of God's making, was empowered to make whom he thought fit, high priest; and he did it in equity, for the ancient right was in Zadok, he being of the family of Eleazar, whereas Eli and his house were of Ithamar.

II. The course taken with Shimei. He is sent for, by a messenger, from his house at Bahurim, expecting, perhaps, no better than Adonijah's doom, being conscious of his enmity to the house of David; but Solomon knows how to make a difference of crimes and criminals. David had promised Shimei his life for his time, Solomon is not bound by that promise, and yet will not go directly contrary to it.

1. He confined him to Jerusalem, and forbade him, on any pretence whatsoever, to go out of the city, any further than the brook Kidron, v. 36, 37. Of this, Shimei had no reason to complain; it would also make it the more safe for Solomon, for there he would have him under his eye, and be able to watch his motions; and he plainly tells him that if he ever go out of the rules, he shall certainly die for it; this was a fair trial of his obedience.

2. Shimei submits to the confinement, and thankfully takes his life on those terms; he enters into 34 So [i] Benaiah the son of Jehoiada went up, and fell upon him, and slew him: [j] and he was buried in his own house [k] in the wilderness.

35 And the king put Benaiah the son of Jehoiada in his room over the host: and [l] Zadok the priest did the king put in the room of Abiathar.

36 ¶ And the king sent and called for [m] Shimei, and said unto him, [n] Build thee an house in Jerusalem, and dwell there, and go not forth thence any whither.

37 For it shall be, that on the day thou goest out, and passest [o] over the brook Kidron, thou shalt know for certain that thou shalt surely die: [p] thy blood shall be upon thine own head.

38 And Shimei said unto the king, [q] The saying is good: as my lord the king hath said, so will thy servant do. And Shimei dwelt in Jerusalem many days.

B. C. 1011. 39 And it came to pass at the end of three years, that two of the servants of Shimei ran away unto [r] Achish son of Maachah king of Gath. And they told Shimei, saying, Behold, thy servants be in Gath.

Verse 34.

House in the wilderness.] Roberts thinks, this could not have been a dwelling house, as it was in the wilderness, and understands it of such a house as 'children or parents [in the E.] often build in a retired place, over, or for the remains of their dead; and the rest of the family, when they die, are buried there. Some of these are most splendid. In some, too, the funeral car or palanquin [cut, 2 Sam. 3: 31.] in which the corpse was brought, is suspended from the roof. At the anniversary of the death of a father, mother, or any other near relation, the friends go thither to perform the annual rites for the benefit of their manes. Such a house, so long as the descendants of the dead interred there have the power to prevent it, will never be allowed to go to decay.' PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 26—46. Those, who have disgraced the sacred ministry by their crimes, are unworthy to officiate in holy things, and should be excluded from them; and wicked priests, though often spared here, will hereafter receive the deepest condemnation. Yet distinctions should be made in the punishment of the guilty; former services and sufferings in a good cause may plead for an alleviation of the sentence, where the law of God will admit of it: and in every event his word will one way or other be accomplished.—Even murder admits of degrees of criminality. The character of the persons murdered, their rank, and usefulness to society; and the malice, treachery, and boldness, with which the crime was perpetrated; enhance proportionably its malignity.—Different offenders ought to be treated in diverse ways, and punishments so inflicted, as may appear most equitable.—The kingdom of Christ is established by the ruin of its obstinate opposers, and the advancement of its cordial friends. Those who injure his people will be called to account perhaps long after; and all, who are kind to them, shall be surely recompensed. May we be his faithful subjects! May the Lord more and more establish and extend his kingdom, by making his foes his footstool; and may the whole earth be filled with his glory, and with the acclamations of his willing people! SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. As Rehoboam was born before the death of David, (comp. 11:42. with 14:21.) it is plain Solomon had before this married Naamah an Ammonitess; (14:21.) and at this time he married the daughter of the Egyptian king. It is supposed that both of them had embraced the religion of Israel: and, as Solomon is not censured on this account, there might be special reasons inducing him to this conduct, of which we are not informed. SCOTT.

Verses 5—14.

(Gen 20:1—6. 31:23,24 Job 4:12—16. 33:14—18.) In Solomon's and God said, [o] Ask what I shall give thee.

6 And Solomon said, Thou hast showed unto [p] thy servant David my father [q] great * mercy, [r] according as he walked before thee in truth, and in righteousness, and in uprightness of heart with thee; and thou hast kept for him this great kindness, that [s] thou hast given him a son to sit on his throne, as it is this day.

7 And now, O LORD my God, [t] thou hast made thy servant king instead of David my father; and I am but [u] a little child: I know not how [v] to go out or come in.

8 And thy servant is in the midst of [x] thy people which thou hast chosen, a great people, that [y] cannot be numbered nor counted for multitude.

9 [z] Give therefore thy servant an † understanding heart [a] to judge thy people, that I may [b] discern between good and bad; for [c] who is able to judge this thy so great a people?

10 And the speech [d] pleased the LORD, that Solomon had asked this thing.

11 And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and * hast not asked for thyself ‡ long life; neither hast asked riches for thyself, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, but hast asked for thyself understanding, to § discern judgment;

12 Behold, [e] I have done according to thy words: lo, [f] I have given thee a wise and an understanding heart; so that there was none like thee before thee, neither [g] after thee shall any arise like unto thee.

13 And [h] I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, both [k] riches and honor; so that there ‖ shall not be any among the kings like unto thee all thy days.

14 And [i] if thou wilt walk in my ways, to keep my statutes and my commandments, [m] as thy father David did walk, then [n] I will lengthen thy days.

15 And Solomon [o] awoke; and behold, it was a dream. And he came to Jerusalem, and stood [p] before the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and offered up burnt-offerings, and thereby tempting the people to do so too, v. 2, 3. Abraham built his altars on mountains, (Gen. 12: 8.—22: 2.) and worshipped in a grove; (Gen. 21: 33.) thence the custom was derived, and was proper, till the divine law confined them to one place, Deut. 12: 5, 6.

V. 5—15. We have here a gracious visit God made Solomon, and his communion with God in it, which puts a greater honor on him than all the wealth and power of his kingdom.

I. Gibeon, the great high place, should have been the only one, because there the tabernacle and brazen altar were, 2 Chr. 1: 3. Here Solomon offered his great sacrifices, and here God owned him more than in any other of the high places; the nearer we come to the rule in worship, the more reason we have to expect tokens of God's presence; where God records his name, there He will meet and bless us. The time was the night after that generous sacrifice, v. 4. The more we abound in God's work, the more comfort we may expect in Him; if the day has been busy for Him, the night will be easy in Him. Silence and retirement befriend our communion with God: his kindest visits are often in the night, Ps. 17: 3. The manner of it was, in a dream, when his senses were locked up, that God's access to his mind might be the more free and immediate; in this way, God used to speak to the prophets, (Num. 12: 6.) and to private persons, for their own benefit, Job 33: 15, 16. These divine dreams, no doubt, distinguished themselves from those in which are divers vanities, Eccl. 5: 7.

II. The gracious offer God made him, v. 5. He saw the glory of God shine about him, and heard a voice, saying, Ask what I shall give thee. Thus God would testify his acceptance of his sacrifices, and signify what great mercy He had in store for him, if he were not wanting to himself. Thus He would try his inclinations, and honor the prayer of faith. God, in like manner, condescends to us, and puts us in the ready way to be happy, by assuring us we shall have what we will, for the asking, John 16: 23. 1 John 5: 15. What would we more? Ask, and it shall be given you.

III. Solomon readily laid hold on this offer; why do we neglect the like offered to us, like Ahaz, who said, I will not ask? Isa. 7: 12. Solomon prayed in his sleep, God's grace assisting him; yet it was a lively prayer. What we are most in care about, and which makes the greatest impression on us when awake, commonly affects us when asleep; and by our dreams, sometimes, we may know what our hearts are upon. Plutarch makes virtuous dreams one evidence of increase in virtue. Yet this must be attributed to a higher source. Solomon's making such an intelligent choice as this, when asleep, showed it came purely from the grace of God, which wrought in him these gracious desires. If his reins thus instruct him in the night season, he must bless the Lord who gave him counsel, Ps. 16: 7. His prayer,

1. Acknowledges God's great goodness to David, v. 6. He speaks honorably of his father's piety, drawing a veil over his faults. It is to be hoped those who praise their godly parents, will imitate them. But he speaks more honorably of God's goodness to his father, in giving him to be sincerely religious, and then recompensing his sincerity; and the great kindness He had kept for him, to be bestowed on his family when he was gone, in giving him a son to sit on his throne. Children should thank God for his mercies to their parents; for the sure mercies of David. The way to get the entail perpetuated, is, to bless God that it has hitherto been preserved.

2. He owns his own insufficiency for the discharge of that great trust to which he was called, v. 7, 8. And here is a double plea to enforce his petition for wisdom, namely, that his place required it, and he wanted it, as one that had an humble sense of his own deficiency; he calls himself a child in understanding, though his father called him a wise man, ch. 2: 9. Note, Those who are employed in public stations, ought to be very sensible of the weight and importance of their work, and their own insufficiency for it; then they are qualified to receive divine instruction. Paul's question (Who is sufficient for these things?) is much like Solomon's here, v. 9. Absalom, who was a fool, wished himself a judge; Solomon, who was a wise man, trembles at the undertaking, and suspects his own fitness for it. The more knowing and considerate men are, the better acquainted they are with their own weakness, and the more jealous of themselves.

3. He begs of God to give him wisdom; (v. 9.) and pleads his relation to God, as his servant, 1 s.

dream, the powers of his soul were supernaturally invigorated; and he was enabled to receive the divine vision, and to make a suitable choice in the case referred to him. His single petition therefore was, that the Lord would give his servant an understanding heart: i. e. that He would enlarge and strengthen his intellectual powers, give him a ready discernment in spiritual things, and a correspondent disposition; and furnish him with the peculiar talents and capacities for government; that he might administer justice and judgment, with impartial rectitude and deep penetration, for the benefit of the people and the honor of God. Doubtless these sentiments were habitually in Solomon's mind, previously to this dream: and his consciousness of his own insufficiency had led him to depend on the Lord to qualify him for the discharge of the duties of his important station: and his request accorded to the exhortations David had given him, and the prayers he had offered for him. (1 Chr. 22:11, 12. 28:9. 29.10—19. Ps. 72: title. 1, 2. Prov. 2:1—6. 14:8. Jam. 1:5—8.)—Absalom and Adonijah do not seem to have been troubled with anxiety on this account, though far inferior to Solomon in capacity for ruling: but they sought the honor and power of the kingdom, he desired to discharge the duty of a king.—The disposition and judgment which dictated this petition, in preference to all those alluring distinctions which carnal minds pursue, and which especially attract young persons in superior stations, was well pleasing to the Lord. SCOTT.

"What can I do in it, I am but a boy of yesterday's birth." So in pleading for forgiveness, "I am but a little child, it was my ignorance," &c. This is one of the innumerable cases where a knowledge of the manners, customs, habits of thought and expression of the modern orientals, is obviously necessary to a full understanding of the Bible. offered [q] peace-offerings, and made [r] a feast to all his servants.

[Practical Observations.]

16 ¶ Then came there [s] two women, that were harlots, unto the king, and [t] stood before him.

17 And the one woman said, [u] O my lord, I and this woman dwell in one house, and I was delivered of a child with her in the house.

18 And it came to pass, the third day after that I was delivered, that this woman was delivered also: and we were together; there was no stranger with us in the house, save we two in the house.

19 And this woman's child died in the night, because she overlaid it.

20 And she arose, at [x] midnight, and [y] took my son from beside me, while thine handmaid slept, and laid it in her bosom, and laid her dead child in my bosom.

21 And when I arose in the morning to [z] give my child suck, behold it was dead; but when I had considered it in the morning, behold, it was not my son which I did bear.

22 And the other woman said, [a] Nay; but the living is my son, and the dead is thy son. And this said, No; but the dead is thy son, and the living is my son. Thus they spake before the king.

23 Then said the king, The one saith, This is my son that liveth, and thy son is the dead: and the other saith, Nay; but thy son is the dead, and my son is the living.

24 And the king said, Bring me a sword. And they brought a sword before the king.

25 And the king said, [b] Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one, and half to the other.

116: 16. Thus his good father prayed, Ps. 119: 125. An understanding heart is God's gift, Prov. 2: 6. We must pray for it, (James 1: 5.) and pray for it with application to our particular calling, and various occasions, as Solomon's, v. 9. That is the best knowledge, which will be serviceable in doing our duty; and such that knowledge is, which enables us to discern between good and bad, right and wrong, sin and duty, truth and falsehood, so as not to be imposed upon by false colors, in judging either of others' actions, or our own.

4. The favorable answer God gave, v. 10. God is well pleased with his own work in his people, the desires of his own kindling, the prayers of his Spirit's inditing. Those are accepted of God, who prefer spiritual blessings to temporal, and are more solicitous to be found in the way of duty, than preferment. But that was not all; it was a prevailing prayer. God gave him wisdom, v. 12. Such an insight, and such a foresight, never was prince so blessed with. He gave him riches and honor into the bargain, (v. 13.) and it was promised he should as much exceed his predecessors, successors, and neighbors, in these, as in wisdom. These also are God's gift, and are promised to all that seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, as far as is good for them, Matt. 6: 33. Let young people learn to prefer grace to gold, because godliness has the promise of the life that now is, but the life that now is, has not the promise of godliness. Wisdom is good, is so much the better with an inheritance, Eccl. 7: 11. But if we make sure of wisdom and grace, those will either bring outward prosperity with them, or sweeten the want of it. God promised Solomon riches and honor, absolutely, but long life, on condition; (v. 14.) he failed in the condition, and therefore, though he had riches and honor, did not live so long to enjoy them, as, in the course of nature, he might. Length of days is Wisdom's right-hand blessing, typical of eternal life; but it is in her left hand that riches and honor are. See here, the way to obtain spiritual blessings, is, to be importunate for them; to wrestle with God in prayer for them, as Solomon did for wisdom, asking that only, as the one thing needful; and the way to obtain temporal blessings, is, to be indifferent to them, and to refer ourselves to God concerning them. Solomon has wisdom given him, because he did ask it, and wealth, because he did not.

5. Solomon's gratitude for the visit, v. 15. He awoke, we may suppose, in a transport of joy; awoke, and his sleep was sweet to him, as the prophet speaks. He had made his prayer at Gibeon, and there God had graciously met him; but he comes to Jerusalem, to give thanks before the ark of the covenant, blaming himself, as it were, that he had not prayed there, the ark being the token of God's presence, and wondering that God had met him any where else. God's passing by our mistakes, should persuade us to amend them.

V. 16—28. An instance is here given of Solomon's wisdom, to show that the grant lately made him, had a real effect upon him. It is probable, the cause had been heard in the inferior courts, before it was brought before Solomon, and had been found special, the judges being unable to determine it, that Solomon's wisdom in deciding it, at last, might be the more noted. We see in it, 1. What anxiety is caused by little children, how uncertain their lives are, and to how many dangers they are continually exposed. The age of infancy is the valley of the shadow of death; and the lamp of life, when first lighted, is easily blown out. It is a wonder of mercy, that so few perish in the perils of nursing. 2. How much better it was, in those times, with children born in fornication, than, commonly, it is now. Then they were nursed; whereas now, they are often abandoned, or killed. Thus it is foretold, that in the last days perilous times should come, when people should be without natural affection, 2 Tim. 3: 3.

The question was, Who was the mother of the living child. Both mothers were vehement in their claims, and showed deep concern about it. Neither will own the dead child. The living child is the parents' joy, because their hope; and may not the dead children be so? See Jer. 31: 17. The difficulty of the case was, there was no evidence on either side. To put the parties to the rack, would have been barbarous; not she who had justice on her side, but she who was most hardy, would have had the judgment in her favor. Little stress is to be laid on extorted evidence.

Solomon, having patiently heard both sides, sums up the evidence, v. 23. And now the who.e

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. Such as love the Lord ought to copy the examples, and follow the instructions, of those who have gone before them in the same path; especially of pious parents: but they should be careful to avoid their errors and transgressions; for even good men find it difficult to act themselves at all times as they would counsel others: so that defects will be found in the best characters, and the best state of the church on earth. We should indeed watch and pray against all evil in ourselves, and use our influence to prevent it in others: yet we should expect to see many things that we disapprove, and learn to make allowances for them.—The Lord by his Gospel, in effect, makes this proposal to all who hear it, 'Ask what I shall give thee.' (Matt. 7: 7—11.) He does not indeed engage to gratify the desires of the ambitious, the covetous, the sensual, the envious, or the revengeful: but He is ever ready to answer the petitions of those, who ask of Him heavenly wisdom and spiritual blessings, however guilty, depraved, and foolish they have hitherto been; and we should honor the riches of his all-sufficiency and liberality, by multiplying and enlarging our requests, and grasping at more and more from Him; for He will take it graciously, and deal with us accordingly.—Distinguishing favors require peculiar returns of gratitude: and a man's being evidently called to very important and arduous services, may dictate his prayers, and encourage his expectations of proportionable assistance.—Such as succeed eminently wise and good men, should ask a double portion of wisdom and grace, to answer the expectations of others from them: and they who, in deviation from ordinary rules, are employed in any public service, will be more narrowly watched, and more severely censured, if they act inconsistently. Let not this hint be overlooked, or taken amiss, by those who preach the Gospel without an express regular appointment from man, in any of those ways by which ministers are ordinarily sent forth.—The continued blessing of God can be expected only in the way of persevering obedience: and negligence or wickedness will always ensure loss in our temporal or spiritual comforts. SCOTT.

Verses 23—28.

In many countries such cases have been decided by lot, and, which is much worse, by duels; or the parties have been tortured, that they might be compelled to declare the truth. But Solomon adopted the only rational method, by making use of his acquaintance with the human heart, to discover which of them had the feelings of a mother for the living child.—The murder of illegitimate infants by their mothers, to conceal their own sin and shame, which so frequently occurs in this land, is not so much as intimated in any way in the Scriptures, nor, as far as my reading and recollection extend, in any ancient history. The state of morals among the heathen accounts for this, among them, in two ways: 1st. It was not considered as peculiarly disgraceful to either parent to have spurious children: and 2dly. The common practice of exposing infants, whether spurious or not, excluded all temptation to the secret murder of any. But the case must have been very different in Israel: yet this crime seems never to have

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—28. Judges, magistrates, and all concerned in trying causes, need great discernment, as well as integrity, in order to search out the truth, when all possible pains and fallacy are employed to conceal it: they ought therefore, in all their studies and in all their decisions, to ask wisdom of God; and we should earnestly remember them in our prayers, that He would confer it upon them.—Where the Lord has given abilities, and a heart disposed to improve them, He will open a way for the profitable exercise of them in his due time: and an accurate acquaintance with the human heart will be found a more profitable kind of knowledge for all, but especially for magistrates and ministers.—God has made natural affection very strong, especially in mothers, as the great means of preserving their infants, in the midst of their dangers and infirmities, and notwithstanding all the trouble and fatigue which they occasion. Yet human depravity, habitual wickedness, or fear and shame, can extinguish it, and even mothers are capable of becoming the murderers of their own infants! Surely these harlots will rise up in judgment against such unnatural criminals, and condemn them; and still more their brutal seducers, who have deserted them when exposed to these awful temptations. SCOTT.

occurred; nor was any law enacted concerning it. It is not, however, difficult to discover the cause of its frequent and horrid occurrence in our enlightened land, in the stern rejection of the offending female, if detected, from the society of all who are not thus disgraced, without discrimination, or hope of recovery from this infamous loss of caste, so to speak; and in the entire impunity of her male paramour, though perhaps far more deeply criminal. [The hopeless, pitiless lot of these most forlorn, offending females, is one of the blackest stains on the female character, taken in connection with the treatment licentious young men receive in society.] And it is a question of no small importance, in every view, whether some measures might not be taken, to counteract this dire evil, without lowering the standard of morality, or giving encouragement to vice. SCOTT.

21 And [l] Solomon reigned over all kingdoms, from the river unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt: they [m] brought presents, and served Solomon all the days of his life.

22 ¶ And Solomon's † provision for one day was thirty ‡ measures of fine flour, and three-score measures of meal,

23 [n] Ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and an hundred sheep, beside harts, and roe-bucks, and fallow-deer, and fatted fowl.

24 For he had dominion over all the region on this side the river, from Tiphsah even to [o] Azzah, over [p] all the kings on this side the river: and he [q] had peace on all sides round about him.

25 And Judah and Israel dwelt § safely, [r] every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree, [s] from Dan even to Beer-sheba, all the days of Solomon.

of this trust into so many hands was prudent, that no one might be continually burdened with the care of it, nor grow exorbitantly rich with the profit of it; but that Solomon might have those, in every district, who, having a dependence on the court, would be serviceable to him and his interest, as there was occasion.

These commissioners of the victualling-office are here named; several only by their surnames, as great men commonly call their servants; though several also by their proper names. Two of them married Solomon's daughters, v. 11, 15. and no disparagement to them, to marry men of business. Better match with the officers of their father's court, that were Israelites, than with the sons of princes, that were strangers to the covenant of promise. The son of Geber was in Ramoth-gilead, (v. 13.) and Geber himself was in the country of Sihon and Og, which included that and Mahanaim, v. 19. He is therefore said to be the only officer in that land, because the other two, mentioned v. 13, 14. depended on him, and were subordinate to him.

V. 20—28. Such a kingdom, and such a court, sure never prince had, as Solomon's here.

I. Such a kingdom. Never did the crown of Israel shine so bright, as when Solomon wore it; never in his father's days, never in the days of any of his successors; nor was that kingdom ever so glorious a type of the Messiah's, as then. The account here fully answers the prophecies concerning it, Ps. 72. a psalm for Solomon, but with reference to Christ.

1. The territories were large, and tributaries many: so it was foretold, he should have dominion from sea to sea, Ps. 72: 8—11. Solomon reigned not only over all Israel, who were his subjects by choice, but over all the neighboring kingdoms, who were his subjects by constraint. All the princes from the river Euphrates N. E. to the border of Egypt S. W. not only added to his honor, by doing him homage, and holding their crowns from him, but added to his wealth, by serving him, and bringing him presents, v. 21. David, by his successful wars, compelled them to this subjection, and Solomon, by his admirable wisdom, made it easy and reasonable; for it is fit the fool should be servant to the wise in heart. If they gave him presents, he gave them instructions, and still taught the people knowledge; not only his own people, but those of other nations; and wisdom is better than gold. He had peace on all sides, v. 24. None, of all the nations subject to him, offered to shake off his yoke, or give him any disturbance; but, rather, thought themselves happy in their dependence on him. Herein, his kingdom typified the Messiah's; for to Him it is promised, that He shall have the heathen for his inheritance, and that princes shall worship Him, Isa. 49: 6, 7. 53: 12.

2. The subjects of this kingdom, and its inhabitants, were many and cheerful, v. 20. Now was fulfilled the promise made to Abraham, concerning the increase of his seed; (Gen. 22: 17.) as well as that concerning the extent of their dominion, Gen. 15: 18. God's spiritual Israel are many, at least they will be so, when they all come together, Rev. 7: 9. All were also easy; they dwelt safely, or, with confidence and assurance; (v. 25.) not jealous of their king, or of his officers; not disaffected, either to him, or to one another, nor under any apprehension of danger from enemies foreign or domestic. Solomon invaded no man's property, as sometimes was the manner of the king, (1 Sam. 8: 19.) but protected every man in the possession and enjoyment of it. They dwelt every man under his vine and fig-tree. So great was the peace, that they might dwell as safely under their shadow, as within the walls of a city. Or, because it was usual to have vines by the sides of their houses, (Ps. 128: 3.) they are said to dwell under their vines. They were cheerful in the use of their plenty, eating and drinking, and making merry, v. 20. Solomon taught them that God gave them their abundance, that they might use it soberly and pleasantly, not that they might hoard it up. There is nothing better than for a man to eat the labor of his hands, and that, with a merry heart. His father, in the Psalms, had led his people into the comforts of communion with God, and now he led them into the comfortable use of the good things of this life. This pleasant posture of Israel's affairs extended, in place, from Dan to Beer-sheba; and continued a long time, all the days of Solomon, without any material interruption. The spiritual peace, and joy, and holy security, of all the faithful subjects of the Lord Jesus, were typified by this. The kingdom of God is not, as Solomon's was, meat and drink, but, what is infinitely better, righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

II. Such a court Solomon kept, as can scarcely be paralleled. We may guess at the vast number of his attendants, and the great resort to him, by the daily provision for his table; bread enough, as is computed, to serve 3000 men; Carellus says above 48000 men; and the provision of flesh (v. 23.) rather more, in proportion; vast quantities of beef, mutton, and venison, and the choicest of all fatted things, as some, fatted fowl. Ahasuerus once made a great feast, to show the riches of his kingdom, Esth. 1: 3, 4. But it was much more the honor of Solomon, that he kept a constant table, and a noble one, not of dainties, or deceitful meats, (he himself witnessed against them, Prov. 23: 3.) but substantial food, to the entertainment of those who came to hear his wisdom. Thus Christ fed those whom He taught, 5000 at a time, more than ever Solomon's table would entertain at once: all believers have in Him a continual feast. Herein He far outdoes Solomon, that He feeds all his subjects, not with the bread that perishes, but with that which endures to eternal life.

It added much, both to the strength and glory of Solomon's kingdom, that he had such abundance of horses, perhaps 1000 in every tribe, for preserving the public peace, v. 26. God had commanded their king not to multiply horses, (Deut. 17: 16.) nor, considering the extent and wealth of Solomon's kingdom, did he multiply horses in proportion to his neighbors; even the Philistines brought into the field 30,000 chariots, (1 Sam. 13: 6.) and the Syrians, at least, 40,000 horse, 2 Sam. 10: 18. The same officers provided alike for his house, and for his table, v. 27, 28. Every one knew his place, work, and time; and so this great court was kept without confusion. Solomon, that had vast incomes, lived at a vast expense; and perhaps wrote that, with application to himself, When goods increase, they are increased that eat them; and what good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes, unless withal they have the satisfaction of doing good with them?

V. 29—34. Solomon's wisdom here described was more his glory than his wealth.

I. Its fountain. God gave it him, v. 29. He owns it himself, (Prov. 2: 6.) The Lord giveth wisdom: He gives the powers of reason, (Job 38: 36.) preserves and improves them. The ordinary advances of them are owing to his providence, the sanctification of them, to his grace; and this extraordinary pitch at which they arrived in Solomon, to a special grant, in answer to his prayer.

II. Its fulness. He had wisdom and understanding, exceeding much; great knowledge of distant countries, and the histories of former times; a quickness of thought, strength of memory, and clearness of judgment, such as never any man had. It is called largeness of heart, for the heart is often put for the intellectual powers. He had a vast compass of knowledge, could take things entire, and had an admirable faculty of laying things together. Some, by his largeness of heart, understand his courage and boldness, and that great assurance with which he delivered his dictates and determinations. Or, it may be meant of his disposition to do good with it. He was very free and communicative of his knowledge; had the gift of utterance, as well as wisdom. Note, It is very desirable that those who have large gifts of any kind, should have large hearts to use them for the good of others; and this is from the hand of God. Eccl. 3: 24. He shall enlarge the heart. Ps. 119:32.

The greatness of Solomon's wisdom is illustrated by comparison. Chaldea and Egypt were nations famous for learning; thence the Greeks borrowed theirs; but the greatest scholars of these nations came short of Solomon, v. 30. If nature excels art, much more does grace. The knowledge God gives by special favor, goes beyond what man gets by his own labor. Some wise men there were in Solomon's time, particularly Heman, and other Levites, employed by David in the temple music, 1 Chr. 15: 19. Heman, his seer in the word of God, 1 Chr. 25: 5, Chalcol and Darda, but Solomon excelled them all, v. 30.

III. The fame and fruits of it. It was talked of in all nations round about. His great wealth and glory made his wisdom much more illustrious. The jewel of wisdom may receive great advantage by the setting of it. He did not bury his talent, but showed his wisdom.

1. In his compositions. Those in divinity, written by divine inspiration, are not mentioned here; they are extant, and will remain to the world's end, monuments of his wisdom; and are, as other parts of Scripture, of use to make us wise unto salvation. But beside those, it appears he was, (1.) A moralist; he spake 3000 proverbs, wise sayings, apophthegms, of admirable use for the conduct of human life. Whether those proverbs of Solomon we have, were any part of the 3000, is uncertain. (2.) A poet, and a man of great wit. His songs were a thousand and five, of which only one is extant, as divinely inspired, which is therefore called his Song of songs. His wise instructions were communicated, by proverbs, that they might be familiar to them he designed to teach, and ready on all occasions; by songs, that they might be pleasant, and move the affections. (3.) A natural philosopher, and a man of great learning, and insight into the mysteries of nature: from his own and others' observations and experience, he wrote both of plants and animals, (v. 33.) descriptions of their natures and qualities, and (some think) of their medicinal uses.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—28. True wisdom generally directs those, who succeed prudent and prosperous men in kingdoms or estates, to tread in their steps, to employ their servants, and to avail themselves of the good advice of their friends and counsellors: but folly and self-conceit delight in making many and great changes, though they commonly prove disadvantageous. (12: 6—15. 2 K. 21: 1—3. Ec. 2: 18—23.)—Those who faithfully seek the good of our souls, though sometimes with sharp reproofs, are our best friends: and their memories are always entitled to grateful respect, and their children to kind regard; yet these are worthy of a wise man's confidence and friendship, only when they tread in the steps of their pious parents.—It is extremely difficult to possess abundance, without covetousness, luxury, or ostentation; without abusing, wasting, or burying, the goods of our common Lord, to whom every one must give an account of his stewardship: yet, prudent management and frugality are excellent appendages to liberality, and serve to support the expenses of it.—Wise and righteous princes are most valuable blessings to whole kingdoms, and should be sought in prayer from that God, who has all hearts in his hands.—Wealth without wisdom, and knowledge without humility and grace, are generally destructive to the possessor, and to those with whom he is connected; yet both are the gifts of God, good in themselves, and only evil as perverted by man's depravity. And heavenly wisdom teaches men to give God the glory in the use of these inferior blessings, and so renders them ornamental to the Christian profession, and conducive to promote designs of extensive usefulness. SCOTT.

Verse 26.

'1400 chariots, &c.' 10:26. 2 Chr. 1:14. '4000 stalls for horses and chariots, &c.' 2 Chr. 9:25. Different ways have been taken of reconciling these texts; none of which are satisfactory. 4000 stalls (not stables would be a proper number, for 1000 chariots to have change of horses. The 400 might be added afterwards. As numbers were generally expressed in the manuscripts by numeral letters, over which, in many cases, a small mark distinguished one number from another much smaller; it seems most obvious to suppose, that a trivial mistake has here occurred. 40,000 stalls for chariot horses, (unless all sorts of carriages be included,) seems out of all proportion to 12,000 horsemen: and in no other place are more than 1400 chariots mentioned. (10:24—27. Deut. 17:16.) SCOTT.

Verse 29.

Largeness of heart, &c.] This expression and comparison denote the unparalleled greatness of Solomon's intellectual powers, his most extensive knowledge, and his enlargement of heart in communicating instruction to all around him. 'A mind very comprehensive of all sorts of knowledge; and a heart to do a vast deal of good. . . . As the sand . . . encloses a vast body of waters; so his mind contained an ocean of knowledge, as Lord Bacon . . . speaks.' Bp. Patrick. (Ps. 119: 32. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) SCOTT.

2. In his conversation. There came persons from all parts, who were more inquisitive after knowledge than their neighbors, to hear the wisdom of Solomon, v. 34. Kings sent their ambassadors to hear it, and to bring them instructions from it. Solomon's court was the staple of learning, and the rendezvous of philosophers, i. e. the lovers of wisdom, who all came to light their candle at his lamp. Let those who magnify modern learning above that of the ancients, produce such a treasure of knowledge, any where in these latter ages, as that was, which Solomon was master of; yet this puts an honor on human learning, that Solomon was praised for it, and recommends it to the great men of the earth, as well worthy their diligent search. But, lastly, Solomon was, herein, a type of Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; and hid for use, for He is made of God to us, wisdom.

CHAP. V. The great work Solomon was raised up to do, was, the building of the temple; his wealth and wisdom were given him for that. In this, especially, he was to be a type of Christ, for He shall build the temple of the Lord, Zech. 6: 12. In this ch. we have an account of his preparations for that and other buildings. Gold and silver his good father had prepared in abundance, but timber and stone he must get ready; and about these we have him treating with Hiram.

V. 1—9. We have here an account of the amicable correspondence between Solomon and Hiram. Tyre was a famous trading city, close on the sea, in the border of Israel; its inhabitants, (as should seem,) none of the devoted nations, nor ever at enmity with Israel; therefore David never offered to destroy them, but lived in friendship with them. It is said here of Hiram their king, that he was ever a lover of David; and we have reason to think he was a worshipper of the true God, and had himself renounced, though he could not reform, the idolatry of his city. David's character will win the affections of those that are without. Here is,

I. Hiram's embassy of compliment, v. 1. He sent, as is usual among princes, to condole with Solomon on the death of David, and to renew alliances on his succession to the government. It is good keeping up friendship and communion with families in which religion is uppermost.

II. Solomon's embassy of business to Hiram; his letter acquaints him,

1. With his design to build a temple to the honor of God. Solomon tells Hiram, (1.) David's wars obstructed him, that he could not build this temple, though he designed it, v. 3. See what need we have to pray, that God will give peace in our time, because, in time of war, the building of the gospel-temple commonly goes slowly on. (2.) That peace gave him an opportunity to build it, and therefore he resolved to set about it immediately, There is no adversary; (v. 4.) no Satan, so the word is, no instrument of Satan to oppose it, or to divert us from it. Satan does all he can, to hinder temple-work, (1 Thess. 2: 18. Zech. 3: 1.) but when he is bound, (Rev. 20: 2.) we should be busy. When there is no evil occurrent, then let us be vigorous and zealous in that which is good. When the churches have rest, let them be edified, Acts 9: 31. As God's providence excited Solomon to think of building the temple, by giving him wealth and leisure, so his promise encouraged him. God had told David his son should build him a house; v. 5. Let God's promise quicken our endeavors.

2. With his desire that Hiram would assist in it. Lebanon was the place whence timber must be had, a noble forest in the N. of Canaan, particularly expressed in the grant of that land to Israel, all Lebanon, Josh. 13: 5. So that Solomon was proprietor of all its productions; the cedars of Lebanon are spoken of as, in a special manner, the planting of the Lord, (Ps. 104: 16.) being designed for Israel's use, and particularly for temple-service. Canaan was a land of wheat and barley, (Deut. 8: 8.) which employed Israel in the affairs of husbandry, so that they were not at all versed in manufactures: in them, the Sidonians excelled. Israel, in the things of God, are a wise and understanding people; yet, in curious arts, inferior to their neighbors: true piety is a much more valuable gift of heaven than the highest degree of ingenuity. Better be an Israelite skilful in the law, than a Sidonian skilful to hew timber. But, the case being thus, Solomon courts Hiram to send him workmen, and promises, (v. 6.) both to assist them, and to pay them; for the laborer, even in church-work, though it be indeed its own wages, is worthy of his hire. The evangelical prophet, foretelling the glory of the church in the days of the Messiah, seems to allude to this story, Isa. 60. where he prophecies, (1.) That the sons of strangers (such were the Tyrians and Sidonians) should build up the wall of the gospel-temple, v. 10. Ministers were raised up among the Gentiles, for the edifying of the body of Christ. (2.) That the glory of Lebanon should be brought to it to beautify it, v. 13. All external endowments and advantages should be made serviceable to the interests of Christ's kingdom.

3. Hiram's reception of, and return to, this message. (1.) He received it with great satisfaction to himself, v. 7. His generous spirit rejoiced, not only in the prospect of advantage by Solomon's employing him, but in the prospect of Solomon's proving so great a blessing to his kingdom; and he gave God the praise of that, of which he had the pleasure. Let us learn not to envy others wherein they excel us. What a great comfort is it to those who wish well to the Israel of God, to see religion and wisdom kept up in families from one generation to another, especially in great families, and those that have great influence on others: where it is so, God must have the glory of it.

(2.) He returned it with great satisfaction to Solomon, granting him what he desired, and showing himself very forward to assist him in this great and good work, to which he was laying his hand. We have here his articles of agreement with Solomon concerning this affair, in which we may ob-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 29—34. A reputation for wisdom and piety is no further desirable, than as it consists with humility, and affords a man an opportunity of communicating more extensively that useful knowledge, which the Lord has imparted. (Ec. 10: 1.)—Every information, which is needful in order to our glorifying God and obtaining his 'salvation with eternal glory,' is preserved to us in the sacred Scriptures: and the light of Heaven will more certainly and speedily instruct us in all useful knowledge, than all the regretted records of antiquity could do if we had them. Let us then rejoice that the Lord reigns on a mercy-seat, and that his name is Emmanuel. His kingdom was faintly shadowed forth in that of Solomon, but is of a nobler and more heavenly nature. In his days the righteous flourish; their numbers have already been exceedingly multiplied, and future ages shall witness a more rapid and immense increase, 'when all kings shall bow down before Him, and all nations shall serve Him.' (Ps. 72: 8—11.)—But, whilst we look with joyful, longing desires and fervent prayers for these glorious days, let us now sit at his feet, hear his word, ask of Him wisdom, submit to his will, and seek his glory.

(6.) Can skill to hew timber.] Dr. A. Clarke gives here the rules of Vitruvius respecting the season and method of cutting timber, condemning the haste with which the frame-work of houses is prepared, and suggesting that a conformity to the rules might possibly prevent 'the dry rot.' Timber-trees should be felled 3 yrs. before being used, so he. The rapidity of our building will hardly allow this. ED.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who love God are influenced to love one another, and rendered superior to selfish jealousies and envyings: and this divine energy teaches them to rejoice in each other's prosperity, and to be glad to receive or afford mutual assistance in every good undertaking.—The most necessary and successful wars, not only produce very much temporal evil, but obstruct or retard the execution of many useful designs for promoting godliness.—Different persons are qualified for diverse services; and while all harmoniously concur, in their proper places, and by improving their several talents, the common cause will prosper.—God has so constituted the earth, that every nation has its peculiar productions, and its inhabitants their distinguished endowments: thus their mutual intercourse is forwarded; and, by an interchange of benefits, they are instructed to love one another as children of the same family. Happy would it be, if commerce were generally conducted on such principles, and rendered subservient to the promulgation of true religion: but alas! through man's depravity, it has often tended to diffuse wickedness and misery rapidly through the nations of the earth!—All agreements should be made with consideration, that equity may be established, and contests precluded: and great punctuality should be observed in paying laborers their wages.—Frequently, they are most ingenious in the liberal arts, who are strangers to true godliness; and many are employed about the church of God, who have no interest in its blessings. (Ps. 87: 4—7. P. O.) The meanest office in his service is honorable and profitable, if cordially performed: and millions of us poor Gentiles, who in ourselves were devoted to destruction, have been employed by Him. The building of the temple is begun, 1. The dimensions of the house, and its porch, 2, 3. The windows, 4. The chambers, 5—10. The promise of God concerning the temple, 11—13. AND [a] it came to pass in the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, [b] in the month Zif, which is the second month, that he * began to [c] build the house of the LORD.

2 And the house which king Solomon built for the LORD, the length thereof was [d] threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof twenty cubits, and the height thereof thirty cubits.

II. The time when it began to be built, is exactly set down. It was just 480 years after the exodus; allowing 40 years to Moses, 17 to Joshua, 299 to the Judges, 40 to Eli, 40 to Samuel and Saul, 40 to David, and 4 to Solomon, before he began the work. So long it was, after that holy state was founded, before that holy house was built, which, in less than 430 years, was burnt by Nebuchadnezzar; it was thus deferred, because Israel had, by their sins, rendered themselves unworthy of this honor, and because God would show how little He values external pomp and splendor in his service; He was in no haste for a temple. It was in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, the first three years being taken up in settling the affairs of his kingdom, that he might not find any embarrassment from them in this work: and also in preparing the materials. It is not time lost, which is spent in composing ourselves for the work of God, and disentangling ourselves from every thing which might distract or divert us; we are truly serving God, when we are preparing for his service, and furnishing ourselves for it.

III. The materials are brought in, ready for their place, v. 7. It seems, the preparation was, more than common, full and exact; so that, when the several parts came to be put together, there was nothing defective to be added, nothing amiss to be amended; it was to be the temple of the God of peace, therefore no iron tool must be heard in it. Quietness and silence both become and befriend religious exercises. God's work should be done with as much care, and as little noise as may be. The temple was thrown down with axes and hammers; and they that did it, roared in the midst of the congregation; (Ps. 74: 4, 6.) but it was built up in silence. Clamor and violence often hinder, but never further, the work of God.

IV. The dimensions are laid down, (v. 2, 3.) according to the rules of proportion. Some observe the length and breadth were just double that of the tabernacle. Now Israel was more numerous, their place of meeting needed to be enlarged; (Isa. 54: 1, 2.) and now they were richer, they were the better able to enlarge it. Where God sows plentifully, He expects to reap so.

V. An account of the windows, (v. 4.) they were broad within, and narrow without, margin. Such should the eyes of our mind be, reflecting nearer on ourselves than on other people, looking much within, to judge ourselves, but little without, to censure our brethren. The narrowness of the lights intimated the darkness of that dispensation, in comparison with the gospel-day.

The chambers are described, (v. 5, 6.) in which

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. The use and typical meaning of the temple, and those of the tabernacle, were the same: but the movable tabernacle suited the state of Israel when wandering in the wilderness, and a magnificent temple was more proper when they were settled in Canaan. (Ex. 25:8, 9.)—A temple was not indeed essential to the religion of Israel: therefore the building of it was deferred till 440 years after they entered Canaan: (Note, Judg. 11:26.) and this temple was destroyed, in less than 420 after it was finished.—The month Zif was the second of the ecclesiastical year. Some think the names of the months, here given, were not in use before the captivity. SCOTT. Note, Ex. 12:2. ED.

Verses 2, 3.

The temple was a very magnificent building, and immense quantities of gold and silver were used about it: yet, apart from its courts, it was but a small structure, compared with many buildings in ancient and modern times.—It was about 100 feet long, 33 wide, and 50 high: and it had a porch, on the east end at the entrance, which formed in some respects an ornamental steeple, of about 200 feet high. (2 Chr. 3:3, 4.) The tabernacle erected in the wilderness is computed to have been 50 feet long, 12 or 13 wide, and nearly 17 high. SCOTT.

Verse 4.

These windows, which are supposed to have been wider on the inside than without, were situated in the spaces between the chambers afterwards mentioned; or, as some think, above them. (M.) SCOTT.

Verses 5, 6.

For the purpose of fixing these chambers, the wall of the temple was made two cubits thicker at the bottom than at the top: and where it was made a cubit less in thickness, a rest was formed on the outside, for the beams of the second story of chambers to lodge upon, and so for the third. By this contrivance the upper stories were larger than the lower; and the wall of the temple was not weakened, either by building, or by repairing the chambers. It is supposed that there was also a gallery round about, by which the priests entered the chambers; and that there were no chambers over the entrance of the temple. (Ez. 41:5—12.) ID.

Verse 7.

Several of these circumstances may shadow forth spiritual things. (P. O.) ID.

Verse 8.

There seems to have been a door, in each of the two upper stories, into a gallery, which communicated with all the chambers; and wind-house: and they [j] went up with winding stairs into the middle chamber, and out of the middle into the third.

9 So [k] he built the house, and finished it; and covered the house [*] with beams and boards of cedar.

10 And then he built chambers against all the house, five cubits high: and they rested on the house with timber of cedar.

11 ¶ And the word of the LORD came to Solomon, saying,

12 Concerning this house which thou art in building, [l] if thou wilt walk in my statutes, and execute my judgments, and keep all my commandments to walk in them; [m] then will I perform my word with thee, which I spake unto David thy father:

13 And [n] I will dwell among the children of Israel, and [o] will not forsake my people Israel.

[Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ So [p] Solomon built the house, and finished it.

15 And he built the walls of the house within with boards of cedar, [†] both the floor of the house, and the walls of the ceiling: and he covered them on the inside with wood, and covered the floor of the house with planks of fir.

16 And he built twenty cubits on the sides of the house, both the floor and the walls, with boards of cedar: he even [q] built them for it within, even for the oracle, even for the most holy place.

17 And the house, that is, the temple before it, was forty cubits long.

18 And the cedar of the house within was carved with [‡] knops and [§] open flowers: all was cedar; there was no stone seen.

19 And [r] the oracle he prepared in the house within, [s] to set there the ark of the covenant of the LORD.

20 And the oracle in the forepart was twenty cubits in length, and [t] twenty cubits in breadth, and twenty cubits in the height thereof; and he overlaid it with [‖] pure gold; and so covered [u] the altar which was of cedar.

21 So Solomon [x] overlaid the house within with pure gold; and he

2. The work Solomon did for God. So he built the house; (v. 14.) so animated by the message God had sent him, so admonished not to expect God should own his building, unless he were obedient to his laws; thus he built it. The strictness of God's government will never drive a good man from his service, but quicken him in it. Solomon built and finished; he grew not weary of the work, met not with any obstructions, (as Ezra 4: 24.) did not outbuild his property, nor do it by halves; but, having begun to build, was both able and willing to finish, for he was a wise builder.

V. 15—38. Here is,

I. The wainscot of the temple described; it was of cedar, (v. 16.) strong, and durable, of a very sweet smell, and curiously carved with knops (like eggs or apples) and flowers; no doubt, as the fashion then was, v. 18.

II. The gilding; not like ours, washed over, but the whole house, all the inside of the temple, (v. 22.) even the floor, (v. 30,) he overlaid with gold, and the most holy place with pure gold, v. 21. Solomon would refuse no expense necessary to make it every way sumptuous; gold was under foot there, as it should be in all the living temples, the abundance of it lessened its worth.

III. The oracle, or speaking place, (for so the word signifies,) the holy of holies, so called, because that thence God spake to Moses, and perhaps to the high priest, when he consulted with the breast-plate of judgment; in this place, the ark of the covenant was to be set, v. 19. Solomon made every thing new, and more magnificent than it had been, except the ark, which was still the same Moses made, with its mercy-seat and cherubim; that was the token of God's presence, which is always the same with his people, whether

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Though God does not delight in outward magnificence, but is present with his poor people who assemble in the meanest place, and accepts their worship: yet He expects the wealthy to devote their riches to his service. And whatever is liberally expended, out of zeal for his glory, and according to the rule of his Word, shall be graciously accepted; though perhaps some censure the expense, as needless or useless. (Matt. 26: 6—13. John 12: 1—8.)—Every good work should be done heartily and without procrastination: but it is not needless delay to consult prudent measures, to make requisite preparations, and to remove such obstructions, as might afterwards impede our progress, or divert our attention. Thus, young men, animated with a laudable design to seek the salvation of souls, and impatient to be employed in the work of the ministry, would do well to restrain their ardor, to wait for a proper opening in Providence, and to spend some time in previous study, meditation, and prayer; that they may acquire the wisdom, experience, humility, and steadiness, requisite for so important a work; and afterwards proceed in it without interruption, and to better effect: and a few years spent in this manner will no more be lost time, than those which were employed in preparations for the building of Solomon's temple.—The true church of God is most glorious within; and the true believer is chiefly employed in attending to the state of his heart.—In all religious matters conveniency must be preferred to splendor; but stability must not be sacrificed even to apparent conveniency.—No pompous services will purchase a dispensation from obeying the least of God's commandments; for nothing but unreserved obedience to the precepts and statutes of God's Word, can prove the sincerity of our faith, and our love to the Savior. But, though numbers of professors apostatise, and whole nations forfeit their peculiar privileges; yet the Lord will dwell in the midst of his true people, and never forsake them: and they will delight in his ordinances and commandments; and be encouraged by being told their duty, as it is a token of the Lord's favor to them.

'The oracle,' or 'the most holy place,' was either built or ceiled lower than the other part of the temple. The veil, which separated the holy of holies, was hung by golden chains on pillars erected for that purpose. made a partition [y] by the chains of gold before the oracle, and he overlaid it with gold.

22 And the whole house he overlaid with gold, until he had finished all the house: [z] also the whole altar that was by the oracle he overlaid with gold.

23 And within the oracle he made [a] two cherubims of *olive-tree, each ten cubits high.

24 And five cubits was the one wing of the cherub, and five cubits the other wing of the cherub; from the uttermost part of the one wing unto the uttermost part of the other were ten cubits.

25 And the other cherub was ten cubits: both the cherubims were of one measure, and one size.

26 The height of the one cherub was ten cubits, and so was it of the other cherub.

27 And he set the cherubims within the inner house: [b] and †they stretched forth the wings of the cherubims, so that the wing of the one touched the one wall, and the wing of the other cherub touched the other wall; and their wings touched one another in the midst of the house.

28 And he overlaid the cherubims with gold.

29 And he carved all the walls of the house round about with [c] carved figures of cherubims, and [d] palm-trees, and ‡open flowers, within and without.

30 And [e] the floor of the house he overlaid with gold, within and without.

31 And for the entering of the oracle he made [f] doors of olive-tree: the lintel and side-posts were § a fifth part of the wall.

32 The ‖ two doors also were of olive-tree; and he carved upon them carvings of cherubims, and palm-trees, and ¶open  flowers, and overlaid them with gold, and spread gold upon the cherubims, and upon the palm-trees.

33 So also made he for the door of the temple, posts of olive-tree,  a fourth part of the wall.

36 And he built [i] the inner court with three rows of hewed stone, and a row of cedar beams.

38 And in the eleventh year, in the month Bul, which is the eighth month, was the house they meet in tent or temple, it changes not with their condition.

IV. The cherubim. Besides those at the ends of the mercy-seat, which covered the ark, 1. Solomon set up two more, very large ones, images of young men, (as some think,) with wings made of olive-wood, and all overlaid with gold, v. 23, &c. This most holy place was much larger than that in the tabernacle, the ark would seem lost in it, and the dead wall would have been unsightly, had it not been thus adorned. 2. He carved cherubim on all the walls of the house, v. 29. The heathen set up images of their gods, and worshipped them; these were designed to represent the servants and attendants of the God of Israel, the holy angels, not to be themselves worshipped, (See thou do it not,) but to show how great He is, whom we are to worship.

V. The doors. The folding doors that led into the oracle, were but a fifth part of the wall; (v. 31.) those into the temple a fourth part; (v. 33.) both beautified with cherubim engraven on them, v. 32, 35.

VI. The inner court, in which the brazen altar was, and at which the priests ministered; separated from the court, where the people were, by a low wall, three rows of hewn stone topped with a cornice of cedar, (v. 36.) that over it the people might see what was done, and hear what the priests said to them, for, when under that dispensation, they were not kept wholly either in the dark, or at a distance.

Lastly, The time spent in this building; seven years and a half, v. 38. Considering the vastness and elegance of the building, and the many appurtenances to it, which were necessary to fit it for use, it was soon done.

Let us now see what was typified by this temple.

1. Christ is the true Temple; He Himself spake of the temple of his body, John 2: 21. God Himself prepared Him his body, Heb. 10: 5. In Him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead, as the Shechinah in the temple; in Him meet all God's spiritual Israel; through Him we have access with confidence to God; all the angels of God, those blessed cherubim, have a charge to worship Him.

2. Every believer is a living temple, in whom the Spirit of God dwells, 1 Cor. 3: 16. Even the body is such by virtue of its union with the soul, 1 Cor. 6: 19. We are not only wonderfully made, by Divine Providence, but more wonderfully made anew, by the divine graces; this living temple is built upon Christ as its Foundation, and will be perfect in due time.

3. The gospel-church is the mystical temple; it grows to a holy temple in the Lord, (Eph. 2: 21.) enriched and beautified with the gifts and graces of the Spirit, as Solomon's temple with gold and precious stones; only Jews built the tabernacle, but Gentiles join them in building the

It is probable, that, besides the veil, there was another partition between the holy of holies and the sanctuary. The veil covered the whole of this: but when that was drawn aside, folding doors, of olive-tree plated with gold, and curiously engraved with cherubim and palm-trees, took up a fifth of the partition, or about four cubits.—The doors at the entrance of the sanctuary were rather larger. Verse 38.

HISTORY OF THE TEMPLE. 'The temple [see the engraving] was dedicated, (8:1.) says Usher, in the 9th jubilee year, opening the 4th millenary of the world, or 3001; since which it has suffered many revolutions.

'In A. M. 3033, B. C. 967 (before the Vulg. Era 971.) Shishach carried away its treasures; 1 K. 14. 2 Chr. 12.—In 3146, Joash (K. of Judah) got silver together to go upon the repairs of the temple. They began in earnest in 3148. (B. C. 852.) 1 K. 12:4, 5. 2 Chr. 24:7, 8, 9, &c.—In 3264 (B. C. 736) Ahaz gave its riches to Tilgath-pilneser; profaned the holy place, by setting up there an altar like one he had seen in Damascus; took away Solomon's brazen altar, sea, basins, and the king's throne or oratory. He sacrificed to strange gods, and erected profane altars in all the corners of the streets of Jerusalem. He pillaged the temple, broke the sacred vessels, and lastly shut up the house of God, till his death in 3278. Hezekiah (his son) reopened and repaired the gates of the temple in 3278; restored the worship, and sacrifices, and made new sacred vessels in place of those destroyed by his father; but,—in 3291 (the 14th of Hezekiah's reign, B. C. 709) Sennacherib coming with an army into Judah, Hezekiah was forced to give him all the temple-riches, and even the plates of gold he himself had put on the gates. But when the king of Assyria was gone, Hezekiah, doubtless, restored all these things to their first condition,—In 3306 and seq. Manasseh (son of Hezekiah) profaned the temple, by setting up altars to all the host of heaven, even in its courts. He set up idols there and worshipped them. So the king of Babylon carried him in chains beyond the Euphrates in 3328. (B. C. 672 Bef. Vulg. Era 676.) There he repented, and being sent back, redressed his profanations by taking away the idols, destroying the profane altars, and restoring the burnt-offerings' altar, and sacrificing upon it.—In 3380, Josiah king of Judah) labored with all his might in repairing its edifices, either neglected or demolished by his predecessors; commanded the Levites to

CHAP. VII.

Solomon builds himself an house, 1: and the house of the forest of Lebanon, 2—5: the porch of pillars, 6: the porch of judgment, 7: the house of Pharaoh's daughter, 8. The furniture and sacred vessels of gold are made for the temple, 48—50. The dedicated treasures are brought into it, 51.

BUT Solomon was building his own house [a] thirteen years, and he finished all his house.

temple; even strangers and foreigners are built up, a habitation of God, Eph. 2: 19, 22. This temple is built firm, upon a Rock, not to be taken down, as the tabernacle of the O. T. was. The temple was long in preparing, but was built at last; the top-stone of the gospel-church will, at length, be brought forth with shoutings; pity there should be the clashing of axes and hammers in building it. Angels are ministering spirits, attending the church on all sides, and all the members of it.

4. Heaven is the everlasting temple; there the church will be fixed, and no longer movable; the streets of the new Jerusalem, in allusion to the flooring of the temple, are said to be of pure gold, Rev. 21: 21. The cherubim, there, always attend the throne of glory. The temple was uniform, and in heaven there is the perfection of beauty and harmony. In Solomon's temple, there was no noise of axes and hammers; every thing is quiet and serene in heaven: all that shall be stones in that building, must, in the present state of probation and preparation, be fitted and made ready for it, must be hewn and squared by divine grace, and so made meet for a place there.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—12. Never had any man so much of the spirit of building as Solomon, and never man built to better purpose; he began with the temple, built for God first, and then all his other buildings were comfortable. The surest foundations of a lasting prosperity are laid in early piety. Matt. 6: 33. He built,

1. A house for himself, (v. 1.) where he dwelt, v. 8. much of the comfort of this life is connected with an agreeable house. He was less eager and intent, in building his own house, (v. 1.) than in building God's; he was in no haste for his own palace, but impatient till the temple was finished, and fit for use; thus we ought to prefer God's honor before our own ease and satisfaction.

2. The house of the forest at Lebanon, (v. 2.) supposed to be a country-seat near Jerusalem, so called from the pleasantness of its situation, and the trees that encompassed it; but I rather think a house built in the forest of Lebanon itself, whither Solomon might frequently retire with ease; his throne, mentioned v. 7. was not at the house of the forest of Lebanon, and it was not at all improper to put his shields there as in a magazine. Express notice is taken of his buildings, not only in Jerusalem, but in Lebanon; (ch. 9: 19.) and we read of the tower of Lebanon, which looks toward Damascus, (Cant. 7: 4.) which, probably, was part of this house. Being designed for pleasant prospects, there were three tier of windows on each side, light against light, (v. 4, 5.) or, as it may be read, prospect against prospect. Those whose lot is cast in the country, may be well reconciled to a country-life by this, that some of the greatest princes have thought those their most pleasant days, which they have spent in their country retirements.

3. Piazzas before one of his houses, either that at Jerusalem, or that in Lebanon, which were very famous, a porch of pillars, (v. 6.) either for an exchange, or a guard-house, or for those to walk in, that attended him about business, till they could have audience, or for state and magnificence. He himself speaks of Wisdom's building her house, and hewing out her seven pillars, for the shelter of those that, three verses before, (ch. 8: 34.) are said to watch daily at her gates, and to wait at the posts of her door.

4. At his house, where he dwelt in Jerusalem, he built a great hall, or porch of judgment, where was set the throne, or king's bench, for the trial of causes, in which he himself was appealed to, and this was richly wainscoted with cedar, from the floor to the roof, v. 7. He had there also another court within the porch, nearer his house, of smaller work, for his attendants to walk in, v. 8.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14—38. What is begun in the fear and love of God, in dependence on Him, and obedience to Him, will in due time be accomplished to his glory.—God must be honored with the best we have: but gold is only meet to be trodden under foot, in comparison with the beauty of holiness, which is the glory and ornament of his spiritual temple.—The human nature of the Redeemer, that true Temple in which God dwells with man, is immaculately holy: the Christian, as united unto Jesus, and 'an habitation of God through the Spirit,' is sanctified in his measure: and the church above, where innumerable angels unite with redeemed sinners, in ceaseless worship of God our Savior, is perfect in this beauty. Let not then the hypocrite, or formal professor of Christianity, who is a stranger to the sanctifying influences of God's Spirit, and who lives in secret or open sin, suppose himself a part of this living Temple.—Yet let sinners come to Jesus, as the living Foundation, that they may be built on Him, a part of this spiritual house, consecrated in body and soul to the glory of God. (Eph. 2: 19—22. 1 Pet. 2: 4—6.)—If we have good ground to conclude, that we are a part of this living Temple; let us look to it, that our inward part, which is seen by God alone, may be preserved most pure: let us be careful also of our outward conduct, that our blameless conversation may be ornamental to our profession in the sight of man: let us look to Jesus for encouragement and assistance in every service, and as the great Exemplar to which we are to be conformed: and let us by faith behold that glorious company whom we hope soon to join; that we may now emulate their praises, imitate their obedience, and thus anticipate their comforts, even in this world of sin and sorrow.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. As he employed twenty years in these buildings, (9:10.) it seems he finished the temple before he began his own house; though his numerous workmen might have carried on both together. SCOTT.

Verse 2.

Some have thought that this palace was built, for retirement, in a beautiful situation near mount Lebanon: but it seems rather to have been erected not far from Jerusalem; and to have been thus called, either from its airy and lofty situation, or from the cedars of Lebanon of which it was built. For Solomon put the shields of gold 'in the house of the forest of Lebanon:' yet when Shishak came to Jerusalem he seized on them; and when Rehoboam made brazen ones in their stead, they were carried before him when he went to the house of the Lord, and brought back with him to the great chamber. C. F. Head, of the ground plan of a contemporary temple-palace of the kings of Egypt; that of Karnac, at Thebes. It was built by successive replace the ark in the sanctuary; and ordered that it should no more be removed from place to place, as it had been during the reign of the wicked kings.—In 3398, under Jehoiakim, (k. of Judah,) Nebuchadnezzar took away part of the sacred vessels, and placed them in the temple of his god at Babylon; he also carried away others under Jechoniah, in 3405. Lastly, in 3416 (B. C. 584) he took Jerusalem, and entirely destroyed the temple, in the 11th year of Zedekiah.

'It continued buried in its ruins, 52 yrs. till the 1st yr. of Cyrus, at Babylon, in 3468 (B. C. 532. bef. Vulg. E. 536.) Then Cyrus permitted the Jews to return to Jerusalem, and rebuild the temple. Ezra 1: 1, 2, 3. In 3469 they laid its foundation, but had hardly been at work one year, when Cyrus, or his officers, gained over by the enemies of the Jews, forbade them, A. M. 3470. After the death of Cyrus and Cambyses, they were again, in 3483, forbid by the Magian (called in SS. Artaxerxes) who succeeded Cambyses. Lastly, these prohibitions being superseded under Darius, son of Hystaspes, in 3485, the temple was finished, and dedicated 4 yrs. after in 3489, (B. C. 511) 20 yrs. after the return from captivity.—It was profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes in 3837; the ordinary sacrifices discontinued, and the idol of Jupiter Olympus set up on the altar. So it continued 3 years, when Judas Maccabeus purified it, and restored the sacrifice and worship of the Lord, in 3840 (B. C. 160.) 1 Mac. 4:36.

'Herod the Great undertook to rebuild the whole anew. In 3987 he began to lay its foundation, 46 yrs. before the first passover of Christ, as the Jews observe to Him, "46 yrs. was this temple in building," John 2:20. This is not saying that Herod employed 46 yrs. in building it; for Josephus says he built it in 9 yrs. and a half. But after Herod's time they all continued to make additions, and Josephus tells us they went on working upon it till the Jewish war.—Herod's temple, which was very different from Solomon's (see Josephus), subsisted but 77 yrs. when it was destroyed by the Romans in 4073. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Princes and nobles should not expend too much in houses, &c. lest they be straitened in their ability of doing good to others, and glorifying God: (Notes and P. O. Luke 16: 1—12.) nor suffer such cares and contrivances to take up their time, or to draw their affections from communion with God, and the care of their souls: for peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, and the lively hope of a heavenly inheritance, are the choicest comforts; the beauties of holiness are the most valuable ornaments; and distinguished usefulness is the most honorable and durable testimony to a man's character. SCOTT kings, who vied with their predecessors in decorating and adding to this magnificent ancestral palace, whose remains attest to that 'pomp' of Egyptian power, of which Isaiah and Ezekiel speak. Wilkinson says, the most ancient name upon it is of Osirtesen I. whom he considers to have been contemporary with Joseph: thus proving it to be 100 yrs. more ancient than any other building in Thebes. It was surrounded by a wall several thousand feet square; and the elevation on which it stands had numerous monuments connected with this.' The captive towns and districts taken by Shishak [14:25, &c.] in his expedition against Jerusalem, appear on the S. W. wall of the grand hall. Notes, 14:25. and 2 Chr. 12:3, &c. The columns of this hall are of granite, 66 ft. high (without the pedestal and abacus) and 12 in diameter. The temple has the usual accompaniments, avenues of sphinxes, obelisks, propylæa, porticoes, &c. One stone is over 40 ft. ED.

(6—12.) It is not certain, whether 'the porch of pillars,' belonged to 'the house of the forest of Lebanon,' or to the palace in Jerusalem: but it is most probable, that 'the porch for the throne' was at Jerusalem.—The palace seems to have stood within two courts; one nearer to it than 'the porch for the throne,' and the other farther off.—The palace for Pharaoh's daughter was placed at some distance, 'out of the city of David:' (Note, 2 Chr. 8:11.) but it was built with the same magnificence as the other palaces. The costly stones seem to have been large valuable blocks of marble, beautifully squared and polished on every side: and the outer court was surrounded with a wall like that which separated the court of the temple; so that the people might look through the rows of the cedar-beams, which were placed at proper distances. These buildings, though magnificent, were intended for use, and not merely for ostentation: and no doubt were finished in the best style of those days. The court round Solomon's own house was built in the same manner, as the inner court of the house of the Lord. SCOTT A recent traveller thinks the remains of the 'house of Lebanon' are possibly seen in the astonishing ruins at Baalbec, where are stones, 3 of which extend 68 yds. but most are of the size mentioned in v. 10. ED.

Verses 13, 14.

Hiram's mother is in Chronicles said to have been 'of the daughters of Dan;' (2 Chr. 2:14.) and some think, Dan was the name of her father: but, probably, she was originally of the tribe of Dan, and had first been married to a man of Naphtali; and, being by him left a widow, had married a Tyrian to whom she bare Hiram, or Huram, who was called by the name of the king of Tyre. This man, uniting, as it were, the Israelite and the Gentile, and being the chief workman in the furniture of the temple, aptly represented the union of Jews and Gentiles in the Christian church. 31 And the mouth of it, within the chapiter and above, was a cubit: but the mouth thereof was round, after the work of the base, a cubit and a half; and also upon the mouth of it were gravings with their borders, four-square, not round.

32 And under the borders were four wheels: and the axle-trees of the wheels were § joined to the base, and the height of a wheel was a cubit and half a cubit.

34 And there were four undersetters to the four corners of one base. and the undersetters were of the very base itself.

35 And in the top of the base was there a round compass of half a cubit high: and on the top of the base, the ledges thereof, and the borders thereof, were of the same.

36 For on the plates of the ledges thereof, and on the borders thereof, he [m] graved cherubims, lions, and palm-trees, according to the ‖ proportion of every one, and additions round about.

o 2 Chr. 4:6,10.

(2.) Their significancy is intimated in the names given them; (v. 21.) Jachin—He will establish; and Boaz—In Him is strength. Some think they were intended for memorials of the pillar and cloud of fire, which led Israel through the wilderness: I rather think them designed for memorandums to the priests, and others that came to worship at God's door, [1.] To depend on God only, and not on any sufficiency of their own. When we come to wait on God, and find our hearts wandering and unfixed, then, by faith, let us fetch in help from heaven. Spiritual strength and stability are to be had at the door of God's temple, where we must wait for the gifts of grace, in the use of the means of grace. [2.] It was a memorandum to them, of the strength and establishment of the temple of God among them. Let them keep close to God and duty, and they should never lose their dignities and privileges, but the grant should be confirmed and perpetuated. The gospel-church is what God will establish, and what He will strengthen, and what the gates of hell can never prevail against. But when this temple was ly, and to be here included. (16. 2 Kings 25:17.)—There were 400 pomegranates in all; 200 on each chapiter, in two rows of 100 each. Perhaps 96 of these might be counted on every side; being nearly one half of the whole number on each chapiter: but, as some think, there were 96 smaller pomegranates in each row, in four divisions, towards the four quarters of the sky; and four larger pomegranates were placed between these four divisions. (Jer. 52:23.)—A writer, who completely understood such subjects, would scarcely be able, by words without plates, to convey any adequate ideas of the ornamental workmanship described in this chapter. SCOTT.

(15.) 'We should find it difficult, even now, to procure a founder who could cast such massive pillars (about 30 ft. high and 20 round,) whether solid or hollow.' Dr. A. Clarke. Perhaps the greatest triumph of modern art, in this respect, is the column of the Place Vendome, Paris, cast in 1810 at Napoleon's order (by Delaunoy, Lepere, Gendouin, &c.) of brass artillery taken from the Austrians. It is about 141 ft. high, and 12 ft. 9 in. in diameter. The column is of stone, covered with a shell of bronze, (most ingeniously detached from the stones,) in 276 plates, about 3 ft. wide and 4 high, joined irregularly according to the disposition of the bas-relief figures upon them, which ascend in a spiral line. A spiral staircase, of 176 steps, in the centre of the column, ascends to a gallery at the summit. It cost 1,000,000 francs. The bas-reliefs contain a history of the events of the campaign of 1805, in chronological order, commencing at the bottom. The column is surmounted by a bronze statue of Napoleon. ED.

The brazen sea was a very large reservoir, capable of holding 3000 baths, or about 450 hogsheads; though no more than 2000 were generally put into it.—The knops are supposed to have been in the form of an ox's head, (2 Chr. 4:3.) and some think the water flowed out at the mouths of them, or of some of them.—The description given of these bases (33) is very difficult: many of the original words are but seldom used, if at all, elsewhere: and it would be impossible to give a satisfactory explanation of each particular, without labor and prolixity, disproportioned to its importance to us.—The likeness of lions, oxen, &c. we shall hereafter find to be undeniably emblematic of the boldness, patience, diligence, and heavenly-mindedness of the ministers of Christ. (Ez. 1:5—14. Rev. 4:6—8.) Oxen and cherubim are both mentioned, (29) which shows they were not the same figures. (Note, Ex. 10:44.) SCOTT.

40 ¶ And * Hiram made [p] the lavers, and [q] the shovels, and [r] the basins: [s] so Hiram made an end of doing all the work that he made king Solomon for the house of the LORD:

41 The [t] two pillars, and the two bowls of the chapiters that were on the top of the two pillars; and the [u] two net-works, to cover the two bowls of the chapiters which were upon the top of the pillars;

42 And four hundred pomegranates for the two net-works, even two rows of pomegranates for one net-work, to cover the two bowls of the chapiters that were upon † the pillars;

44 And [y] one sea, and twelve oxen under the sea;

45 And [z] the pots, and the shovels, and the basins: and all these vessels, which Hiram made to king Solomon for the house of the LORD, were of ‡ bright brass.

46 In the plain of Jordan did the king cast them, in § the clay-ground between [a] Succoth and [b] Zarthan.

destroyed, particular notice is taken of the destroying of these pillars, (2 K. 25: 13, 17.) which had been the tokens of its establishment, and would have been so, had they not forsaken God.

2. A brazen sea; a very large vessel, above five yards diameter, and which contained above 500 barrels of water for the priests' use, in washing themselves, conducting the sacrifices, and keeping the courts of the temple clean, v. 23, &c. It stood raised on the figures of twelve oxen in brass, so high, that either they must have stairs to climb up to it, or cocks at the bottom to draw water from it. The Gibeonites, or Nethinim, who were to draw water for the house of God, had the care of filling it. Some think Solomon made the images of oxen to support this great cistern, in contempt of the golden calf, that (so Patrick) the people might see there was nothing worthy of adoration in those figures: they were fitter to make posts, than gods. Yet this did not prevent Jeroboam's setting up the calves for deities. In the court of the tabernacle, there was only a laver of brass, but in the court of the temple, a sea; intimating, that, by the gospel of Christ, much fuller preparation is made for our cleansing, than by the law of Moses. Zech. 13: 1.

3. Ten bases, stands, or settles, of brass, on which were put ten lavers, to be filled with water for the service of the temple, because there would not be room at the molten sea for all that had occasion to wash there. The bases on which the lavers were fixed, are very largely described here, v. 27, &c. They were curiously adorned, and set upon wheels, that the lavers might be removed as there was occasion; but, ordinarily, they stood in two rows, five on one side of the court, and five on the other, v. 39. Each laver contained forty baths, that is, about ten barrels, v. 38. They must be very clean that bear the vessels of the Lord Spiritual priests and spiritual sacrifices must be washed in the laver of Christ's blood, and of regeneration. We must wash often, for we daily contract pollution; cleanse our hands, and purify our hearts. Plentiful provision is made for our cleansing; so that if we have our lot for ever among the unclean, it will be our own fault.

4. Beside these, there was a vast number of brass pots to boil the flesh of the peace-offerings in, for the priests and officers to feast upon before the Lord; (see 1 Sam. 2: 14.) also shovels, wherewith they took out the ashes of the altar. Some think the word signifies flesh-hooks, with which they took meat out of the pot. The basins also were made of brass, to receive the blood of the sacrifices. These are put for all the utensils of the brazen altar, Ex. 38: 3. While about it, they made abundance of them, that they might have a good stock by them, when those that were first in use, wore out, and went to decay. Thus Solomon, having wherewithal, provided for posterity.

V. 48—51. Here is, 1. The making of the gold-work of the temple, which, it seems, was done last, for with it the work of the house of God ended. All within doors was gold, and all made new, except the ark, with its mercy-seat and cherubim, the old ones being either melted down, or laid by—the golden altar, table, and candlestick, with all their appurtenances. The altar of incense was still one, for Christ and his intercession are so: but he made ten golden tables, 2 Chr. 4: 8. (though here mention is made of that

48 ¶ And Solomon made all the vessels that pertained unto the house of the LORD: [c] the altar of gold, and [d] the table of gold, whereupon the shew-bread was;

49 And [e] the candlesticks of pure gold, five on the right side, and five on the left, [f] before the oracle, with the flowers, and the lamps, and [g] the tongs of gold;

50 And the bowls, and the snuffers, and the basins, and the [h] spoons, and the  censers, of pure gold; and the hinges of gold, both for the doors of the inner house, the most holy place, and for the doors of the house, to wit, of the temple.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13—51. It is well when great ingenuity unites with equal integrity; when entire confidence is proved to have been well placed; and when every one abounds in the work of the Lord, in proportion as his abilities are enlarged. Yet, in all our services, and after them, we need washing from the guilt and pollution of sin, which defiles us and all we do. Let us therefore bless God for 'the Fountain' which He has 'opened for sin and for uncleanness;' and which by the preaching of the Gospel and the written Word, may be conveyed to every part of the earth. —Those who depend on their own resolutions, wisdom, or works; who trust in riches, honor, prosperity, or powerful friends; who worship other gods, or depend on other intercessors; and who presume on their notions, creeds, or external forms; can never be established, but will at length sink and perish. But the power of Christ rests on the humble believer; his arms uphold him; his grace establishes his heart in hope and love; He is his Stability in every trial, and his Sufficiency for every service: and is both able, and willing 'to keep him from falling, and to present him faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy.' External images cannot describe, words cannot express, the heart cannot conceive, his preciousness or his love. Let us come to Him, and wash away our sins in his blood; let us seek for the purifying grace of his Spirit; let us walk in the light of his instructive Word, and observe his kind directions; let us feed upon Him daily 'in our hearts by faith with thanksgiving,' maintain communion with God the Father, through his intercession, and yield up ourselves and all we have to his service. SCOTT.

Verses 48—51.

Under the gospel-dispensation, externals of worship are altogether changed, but the way of access and acceptance with God is the same. —Most things were multiplied, or enlarged above what they had been in the tabernacle; but there was but one altar of burnt-offering, and one altar of incense as before. Thus the N. T. dispensation is suited to the promulgation of the Gospel through all nations; but the multiplication of atonements and intercessors is antichristian. (M. R.) SCOTT.

(50.) Hinges.] Wilkinson, and others, describe doors 'of two folds turning on bronze pins, which moved in circular grooves,' as common in the tombs of Egypt, of this and former ages. A traveller in 1834 gives the cut of one from the 'tombs of the kings,' at Jerusalem, 'still perfect, hewn out of the same compact limestone that forms the rock, half a foot in thickness: the pannels as nicely cut as in our finest mahogany doors, and the whole highly polished. It turned on tenons of one piece with itself, resting on sockets in the solid rock, fitting most exactly in the door frame, shutting, with its own weight.' 'This kind of pivot hinges,' says Shaw, 'is still very common in the E.' The cut, without doubt, represents the 'hinges' of the text ED.

CHAP. VIII.

Solomon assembles the elders and princes; and the priests carry the ark into the most holy place, 1—9. The glory of the Lord fills the house, 10, 11. Solomon blesses Israel; and praises God for performing his word to David, 12—21. He prays, that God would answer the supplications of Israel, and of strangers, in all ages, and in all cases, in which they should call upon Him, towards this his holy temple, 22—53. He again praises God, and blesses the people, 54—61. He offers very numerous sacrifices, keeps the feast fourteen days; and dismisses the people, who return home joyful and thankful, 62—66.

THEN [a] Solomon [b] assembled the elders of Israel, and all the heads of the tribes, the [*] chief of the fathers of the children of Israel, unto king Solomon in Jerusalem, [c] that they might bring up the ark of the covenant of the LORD, [d] out of the city of David, which is Zion.

2 And all the men of Israel assembled themselves unto king Solomon [e] at the feast, in the month Ethanim, which is the seventh month.

3 And all the elders of Israel came, and [f] the priests took up the ark.

4 And they brought up the ark of the LORD, [g] and the [h] tabernacle of the congregation, and all the holy vessels that were in the tabernacle, even those did the priests and the Levites bring up.

5 And king Solomon, and all the congregation of Israel that were assembled unto him, were with him before the ark, [i] sacrificing sheep and oxen, that could not be told nor numbered for multitude.

6 And [k] the priests brought in the ark of the covenant of the LORD unto [l] his place, into the oracle of the house, to the most holy place, even [m] under the wings of the cherubims.

7 For the cherubims spread forth their two wings over the place of the ark, and the cherubims covered the ark and the staves thereof above.

8 And they [n] drew out the staves, that the [†] ends of the staves were seen out in the [‡] holy place before the oracle, and they were not seen without: and there they are [o] unto this day.

9 [p] There was nothing [q] in the ark save the two tables of stone, which Moses [r] put there at Horeb, [§] when the LORD made a covenant with the children of Israel, when they came out of the land of Egypt.

[Practical Observations.]

CHAP. VIII. The building and furniture of the temple were very glorious, but the dedication of it exceeds in glory, as much as prayer and praise exceed the casting of metal, and the graving of stones. The temple was designed to keep up the correspondence between God and his people; and here we have an account of the solemnity of their first meeting there. These were Israel's golden days; days of the Son of man in type.

V. 1—11. The temple, though richly beautified, while without the ark, was like a body without a soul, or a house without an inhabitant. The bringing in the ark therefore is the end which must crown the work, and here we have its doing with great solemnity.

I. Solomon presides in this service, as David did in the bringing up of the ark to Jerusalem; neither thought it below him to follow the ark, or to lead the people in their attendance on it. Solomon glories in the title of the preacher, (Eccl. 1: 1.) and the master of assemblies, Eccl. 12: 11.

II. All Israel attend the service; their judges, the chief of their tribes and families; all their officers, civil and military; and (as may be said) the heads of their clans. A convention of these might well be called an assembly of all Israel; these came together, on this occasion, 1. To honor Solomon, and to return him the thanks of the nation for all the good offices he had done, in kindness to them. 2. To honor the ark, and testify their universal joy and satisfaction in its settlement. Public mercies call for public acknowledgments. They that appeared before the Lord, did not appear empty, they all sacrificed sheep and oxen innumerable, v. 5. The people, in Solo-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. When those in authority heartily and scripturally promote the cause of true religion, increasing numbers will soon be engaged in the cause: and what a blessed improvement is this of authority, influence, affluence, and wisdom!—But every religious observance is an empty form, unless we hold communion with a reconciled God on a mercy-seat, through the person and work of the Redeemer, and by the influences of his sanctifying Spirit. This is the life and soul of true godliness, which infuses efficacy into every truth, ordinance, or duty; and in all things it should be chiefly attended to. (2 Cor. 3: 17, 18.) For, as far as this is attained, we, the believing servants of God on earth, hold fellowship with the church above; and, with all the company of angels and archangels, we worship the name of God our Savior, with acceptance, and to his glory. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. (Notes, 2 Sam. 6:1, 2. 1 Chr. 13:1—4.) The want of the ark, after the Babylonish captivity, in the temple then built, intimated that that dispensation was ready to vanish away.—Mt. Moriah, on which the temple was built, was near the city of David, on mt. Zion, where the ark was before placed; but was distinct from it. (1 Chr. 21:18—30. 22:1. 2 Chr. 3:1, 2.) SCOTT.

Verse 2.

This was about 11 months after the temple was completed. The intervening time was doubtless employed in getting every thing ready for the solemnity; and the time which was chosen coincided with the feast of tabernacles, which ensured the presence of multitudes of the most zealous and pious Israelites, along with the elders and chief persons. 'Solomon deferred the dedication to the following year after it was finished, because that year, according to Usher, was a jubilee.' Dr. *A. M. 3001; wherein Solomon with great magnificence, celebrated the dedication of the temple 7 days, and the feast of the tabernacle, other 7 days; and the celebrity of the 8th day of tabernacles being finished, upon the 23d day of the 7th month, the people were dismissed, every man to his home. The 8th day of the 7th month, viz. the 30th of our October, being Friday; was the 1st of the 7 days of dedication; the 10th day, Sunday, Nov. 1. was the fast of expiation, or atonement, held; whereon, according to the Levitical law, the jubilee was proclaimed by sound of trumpet. The 15th day, Friday, Nov. 6. was the 1st. of the feast of tabernacles; the 22d (18 of our Nov.) being also Friday, was the feast of tabernacles, which was always very solemnly kept, 2 Chr. 7:9. mon's time, were very rich, very easy, very cheerful; therefore it was fit, on this occasion, they should consecrate not only their cheerfulness, but a part of their wealth, to God and his honor.

III. The priests do their part of the service. In the wilderness, the Levites were to carry the ark, because then there were not priests enough to do it; but here, the priests themselves did it, as they were ordered to do, when it surrounded Jericho. In the ark were the two tables of stone, (v. 9.) a treasure far exceeding all the dedicated things both of David and Solomon. The pot of manna, and Aaron's rod, were by it, but not in it. Brought up with it, (v. 4.) was the tabernacle of the congregation. Probably the one Moses set up in the wilderness, which was in Gibeon, and that David pitched in Zion, were both brought to the temple; for to this they did, as it were, surrender all their holiness, merging it in that of the temple, as henceforward to be the place where God must be sought unto. Thus will all the church's holy things on earth, that are so much its joy and glory, be swallowed up in the perfection of holiness above. The ark was fixed in the place appointed for its rest after all its wanderings, (v. 6) in the oracle of the house, whence they expected God to speak to them, even in the most holy place, which was made so by the presence of the ark, under the wings of the great cherubim, (set up, ch. 6: 27.) signifying the special protection of angels, which God's ordinances and the assemblies of his people are taken under. The staves were drawn out, so as to be seen from under the wings of the cherubim, to direct the high priest to the mercy-seat, over the ark, when he went in, once a year, to sprinkle the blood there; so they still continued of some use, though there was no longer occasion for them to carry it by.

IV. God graciously owns what is done, and testifies his acceptance, v. 10, 11. The priests might come into the most holy place, till God manifested his glory there; but, thenceforward, none might, but at their peril, approach the ark, except the high priest, on the day of atonement. After the priests were come out, the Shechinah cloud appeared, which filled not only the most holy place, but the temple, so that the priests who burnt incense at the golden altar, could not bear it. By this visible emanation of the Divine Glory, 1. God put an honor on the ark, and owned it as a token of his presence. God will now show that it is as dear to Him as ever, and will have it looked on with as much veneration, as when Moses first brought it into his tabernacle. 2. He testifies his acceptance of the building and furnishing of the temple, as good service done to his name and kingdom among men. 3. He struck an awe on this great assembly; and, by what they saw, confirmed their belief of what they read in the books of Moses, concerning the glory of God's appearances to their fathers, that hereby they might be kept close to the service of the God of Israel, and fortified against temptations to idolatry. 4. He showed Himself ready to hear the prayer Solomon was now about to make; and not only so, but took up his residence in this house, that all his praying people might be encouraged to apply to Him there. But the glory of God appeared in a cloud, a dark cloud, to signify, (1.) The darkness of that dispensation, compared with the Gospel, by which, with open face, we behold, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord. (2.) The darkness of our present state, compared with the vision of God, which will be the happiness of heaven, where the Divine Glory is unveiled. Now we can only say what He is not, but then we shall see Him as He is.

V. 12—21. Here, I. Solomon encourages the priests, who came out of the temple from their ministration, much astonished at the dark cloud that overshadowed them. He reminds them that this was a token of God's presence and favor; for He had said, I will appear in a cloud, Lev. 16: 2. Note, Nothing is more effectual to reconcile us to dark dispensations, than to consider what God hath said, and to compare his word and works together, as Lev. 10: 3. God is light, and He dwells in light; but He dwells with men in the thick darkness, makes that his pavilion, because they could not bear the dazzling brightness of his glory. And since God, by this cloud, came down to take possession, Solomon here, in a few words, solemnly gives Him possession, v. 13. It is his joy, that God has taken possession, and his desire, that He would keep it. Let not the priests therefore dread that in which Solomon so much triumphs.

II. He instructs the people, and gives them a plain account concerning this house, which they now saw God take possession of. He spoke briefly to the priests, to satisfy them; but turned his face about, (v. 14.) and addressed himself largely to the congregation that stood in the outer court.

1. He blessed them. When they saw the dark cloud enter the temple, they were astonished, and afraid; the amazing sight, such as they had never seen in their days, we may suppose, drove every man to his prayers, and the vainest minds were made serious by it. Solomon therefore set in with their prayers, and blessed them all; as one having authority, in God's name, he spake peace to them, and a blessing; like that with which the angel blessed Gideon, when in a fright, on a like occasion; (Judg. 6: 22, 23.) Peace be unto thee; fear not, thou shalt not die. Solomon blessed them, i. e. pacified them, and freed them from the consternation they were in. To receive this blessing, they all stood up, in token of reverence, and readiness to hear and accept it. It is a proper posture to be in, when the blessing is pronounced.

2. He informed them concerning this house which he had built, and was now dedicating. He begins his account with a thankful acknowledgment of the good hand of his God upon him hitherto; v. 15. Where we are allowed to have pleasure, God must have praise. Solomon here blessed God, (1.) For his promise to David. (2.) For the performance; that He had now fulfilled it with his hand. We have then the best sense of God's mercies, and most grateful both to ourselves and to our God, when we run up those streams to the fountain of the covenant, and compare what God does with what He has said.

Solomon is now making a solemn surrender or dedication of this house unto God, delivering it to God by his own act and deed. Grants and conveyances commonly begin with recitals of what has been before done, leading to what is now done: accordingly, here is a recital of the special causes and considerations moving Solomon to build this house.

[1.] The want of such a place. It was necessary this should be premised; for, according to the dispensation they were under, there must be one place, in which they must expect God to record his name. If, therefore, there were any other chosen, this would be usurpation. But he shows, from what God Himself had said, that there was no other, (v 16.) I chose no city to build a house in for my name; therefore there is occasion for building this.

Verses 10—14.

All the priests and Levites attended the removal of the ark, and sang solemn praises on the occasion, with the sound of trumpets and instruments of music. (Notes, 2 Chr. 5:11—13.) But when the ark, as the symbol of JEHOVAH's presence, had taken possession of the temple, the cloud filled the whole of it, so that the priests could no longer continue in it. The 'thick darkness' represented the comparative obscurity and terror of that dispensation; and the darkness, which in this world rests on all our inquiries into the things of God and of eternity. 'God' indeed 'is LIGHT, and with Him is no darkness at all:' but we sinners cannot approach or endure that light, except as seen in the person of Jesus Christ. (M. R. v. 2 Cor. 4:5, 6. 1 Tim. 6:13—16. 1 John 1:5—7.) It is not easy to distinguish with accuracy between the cloud, and the glory of God which filled the house. It may, however, be observed, that at the close of Solomon's prayer, the fire burst forth from the cloud and consumed the sacrifices on the altar. (2 Chr. 7:1—3.) SCOTT.

Verses 15—21.

In this introductory address, while Solomon adored and blessed God, with lively gratitude, for performing his promises; he also reminded the people of several particulars, which were well suited to affect their hearts, and prepare them to unite with understanding in heart of David my father to build an house for the name of the LORD God of Israel.

18 And the LORD said unto David my father, [k] Whereas it was in thine heart to build an house unto my name, thou didst well that it was in thine heart.

19 Nevertheless [l] thou shalt not build the house; but thy son, that shall come forth out of thy loins, he shall build the house unto my name.

20 And the LORD [m] hath performed his word that he spake; and I am risen up in the room of David my father, and sit on the throne of Israel, as the LORD promised, and have built an house for the name of the LORD God of Israel.

21 And [n] I have set there a place for the ark, wherein is [o] the covenant of the LORD, which he made with our fathers, when he brought them out of the land of Egypt.

[Practical Observations.]

22 ¶ And Solomon [p] stood before the altar of the LORD in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and [q] spread forth his hands toward heaven;

23 And he said, [r] LORD God of Israel, there is [s] no god like thee, in heaven above, or on earth beneath, [t] who keepest covenant and mercy with thy servants that [u] walk before thee with all their heart;

24 Who hast kept with thy servant David my father, that thou promisedst him: [x] thou spakest also with thy mouth, and hast fulfilled it with thine hand, as it is this day.

25 Therefore now, LORD God of Israel, [y] keep with thy servant David my father that thou promisedst him, saying, [*] There shall not fail thee a man in my sight to sit on the throne of Israel: [†] so that [z] thy children take heed to their way, that they walk before me as thou hast walked before me.

26 And now, [a] O God of Israel, [b] let thy word, I pray thee, be verified, which thou spakest unto thy servant David my father.

27 But [c] will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold [d] the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded.

[2.] David's purpose to build such a place. God chose the person first that should rule his people, v. 16. then He put it into his heart to build a house for God's name, v. 17. It was not a project of his own, to magnify himself; but of his good father.

[3.] God's promise concerning himself: God approved his father's purpose, v. 18. Note, Sincere intentions to do good shall be graciously approved and accepted of God, though Providence prevent our putting them in execution. The desire of a man is his kindness. See 2 Cor. 8: 12. God accepted David's good will, yet would not permit him to do the good work, but reserved that honor for his son, v. 19. The work itself therefore, and his doing of it, was according to God's designation.

[4.] What he himself had done, and with what intention, v. 20, 21. Thus all the right, title, interest, claim, and demand, whatsoever, which he or his had, or might have, in or to this house, or any part of its appurtenances, he resigns, surrenders, and gives up, to God for ever. It is for his name, and his ark. In this, says he, the Lord hath performed his word that He spake. Note, Whatever good we do, we must look upon it as the performance of God's promise to us, rather than the performance of our promises to Him. The more we do for God, the more we are indebted to Him; for our sufficiency is of Him, and not of ourselves.

V. 22—53. Solomon having surrendered this house to God, and God signified his acceptance of it by taking possession, here follows Solomon's prayer; in which he more particularly declares the uses of that surrender, with all humility and reverence, desiring God would agree thereto. In short, his request is that this temple may be deemed and taken, not only for a house of sacrifice, (no mention is made of that, it was taken for granted,) but a house of prayer for all people: and herein it was a type of the gospel-church: see Isa. 56: 7. comp. Matt. 21: 13.

I. Solomon made a good improvement of the pious education his parents gave him. With all his learning, it seems, he learned to pray well, and knew how to express himself to God in a suitable manner, without a prescribed form. In the crowd of his philosophical transactions, proverbs, and songs, he did not forget his devotions. Shall any think themselves too great to do this office for their own families! Solomon, in all his other

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 10—21. When we wait on the Lord in the ways of his appointment, we shall surely receive tokens of his special favor: yet his light is inaccessible to us; and the cloud, with which He veils his insufferable brightness, in his discoveries of Himself to us, sometimes obstructs our view of his love, and causes us to tremble for fear of his judgments. However, blessed be God, in the person of our Emmanuel, and in his complete redemption, 'the thick darkness,' in which JEHOVAH dwells, is greatly dispelled; the dark cloud is become bright to us; (Matt. 17: 5—8.) and though, compared with the beatific vision, we 'see through a glass darkly;' yet, following Him who 'is the Light of the world,' 'we shall not abide in darkness, but shall have the light of life.' Yet sacred joy, gratitude, and love, will ever be mixed with deep humility and reverential fear; and conscious guilt and pollution will connect self-abhorrence, and godly sorrow, with our most fervent praises and adorations.—We all are bound by the strongest obligations to use our utmost exertions for the honor of God. Let us therefore persevere in devising, and endeavoring to execute, plans of usefulness, though we be often baffled and unsuccessful; for it shall at last be declared, that we 'did well that it was in our heart:' and let sinners remember, that they also are accountable to God, and will be punished, for all the wickedness which was conceived in their hearts, though they were restrained in Providence, left destitute of the power, or deterred by the fear of man; and therefore did not actually commit it.

the solemn services of that interesting occasion.—The tables of the law are called the covenant, because the covenant with Israel at Sinai was grounded on them. (Ex. 25:10—22.) SCOTT.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

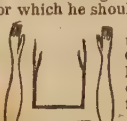
Verse 22.

A scaffold had been prepared in the court of the temple: and on this Solomon stood up to bless and instruct the people, and then kneeled down upon it, to offer the following most copious and comprehensive prayer (2 Chr. 6:13.) To this reverential posture he also added the spreading forth of his hands towards heaven, as expressive of the fervor of his heart, and the largeness of his expectations, in this act of worship. (M. R. q.)—The king of Israel never looked more glorious than on this occasion. Doubtless his personal performance of this service gave it a peculiar solemnity, and greatly affected the people: (2 K. 23:2.) but he was also a type of Christ, who is at once our King and our Intercessor.—It is most probable, that he prayed from a full heart, without any precomposed form of words; but not without having seriously and fully considered the various blessings for which he should pray. SCOTT.



Spread forth his hands towards heaven.] 'An usual custom in all nations. See several Psalms. One of the heathens has said, "all men, in praying, lift up their hands to heaven."' Dr. A. Clarke. A cut is given of the ancient Egyptian hieroglyphic for prayer, ED.

Verse 27.

The heaven of heavens cannot contain thee.] Lit. The heavens, and the heavens of heavens. What inconceivable sublimity of thought is here! The systems upon systems, equal in extent to our solar system, stretching throughout the infinity of space, with their millions upon millions of suns, whose light, travelling these 6000 years, at the rate of 190,000 miles a second, may not yet have reached us, these systems are represented not only as pervaded throughout their endless infinitude by the omnipresent Deity, but as inadequate to contain God! What unparalleled magnificence of thought! How do the conceptions of the heathen of their gods dwindle into nothingness before this Hebrew expression. ED.

28 Yet [c] have thou respect unto the prayer of thy servant, and to his supplication, O LORD my God, to [d] hearken unto the cry and to the prayer which thy servant prayeth before thee to-day;

29 That [e] thine eyes may be open toward this house night and day, even toward the place of which thou hast said, [h] My name shall be there; that thou mayest hearken unto the prayer which thy servant shall make * toward this place.

30 And hearken thou to the supplication of thy servant, and of thy people Israel, [i] when they shall pray † toward this place: [k] and hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place; and when thou hearest, [l] forgive.

[Practical Observations.]

31 ¶ If any man [m] trespass against his neighbor, and ‡ an oath be laid upon him to cause him to swear, and [n] the oath come before thine altar in this house:

32 Then [o] hear thou in heaven, and do, and judge thy servants, [p] condemning the wicked, to bring his way upon his head; and [q] justifying the righteous, to give him according to his righteousness.

33 ¶ When thy people Israel be [r] smitten down before the enemy, [s] because they have sinned against thee, and shall [t] turn again to thee, and confess thy name, glory, even on his ivory throne, looked not so great as now. Great men should thus support the reputation of religious exercises, and so honor God with their greatness. Solomon was herein a type of Christ, the great Intercessor for all over whom He rules.

II. His posture was very reverent, expressive of humility, seriousness, and fervency. He stood before the altar; intimating that he expected the success of his prayer in virtue of that sacrifice to be offered up in the fulness of time, typified by the altar sacrifices. But when he addressed himself to prayer, 1. He kneeled down, as appears, v. 54. where he is said to rise from his knees; comp. 2 Chr. 6:13. Kneeling is the most proper posture for prayer, Eph. 3:14. 2. He spread forth his hands toward heaven; and, as it should seem by v. 54. continued so, to the end of the prayer, hereby expressing his desire toward, and expectations from, God, as a Father in heaven. He spread forth his hands, as it were to offer up the prayer from an open, enlarged heart, and to urge it into heaven; and also to receive the mercy thence, with both arms, which he prayed for. Such outward expressions of the fixedness and fervor of devotion, ought not to be despised or ridiculed.

III. The prayer was very long, yet perhaps longer than is here recorded. At the throne of grace, we have liberty of speech, and should use our liberty. It is not making long prayers, but making them for a pretence, that Christ condemns.

In this excellent prayer, Solomon, (as we should in every prayer,)

1. Gives glory to God. This he begins with, as the most proper act of adoration, v. 23, 24.

2. Sues for grace and favor.

(1.) That God would perform to him and his the mercy promised, v. 25, 26. David had prayed, (2 Sam. 7:25.) Lord, do as Thou hast said. Note, Children should learn of their godly parents how to pray, and plead, in prayer.

(2.) That God would have respect to this temple, and that his eyes might be continually open towards it, v. 29. To this purpose, he premises, [1.] An humble admiration of God's gracious condescension, v. 27. Can we imagine that a Being, infinitely high, and holy, and happy, should stoop so low, as to let it be said of Him, that He dwells upon the earth, and blesses the worms of the earth with his presence? The earth, that is corrupt, and over-spread with sin! Cursed, and reserved to fire! [2.] An humble acknowledgment of the incapacity of the capacious house he had built, to contain God. Note, When we have done the most we can for God, we must acknowledge the infinite distance and disproportion between us and Him, between our services and his perfections. He supposes God's people would ever be a praying people; he resolves to adhere to that duty himself. He directs them to have an eye, in their prayers, to that place where God was pleased to manifest his glory, so as He did not any where else on earth, as an instituted medium of their worship, helping the weakness of their faith, and typifying the mediation of Jesus Christ, the true Temple, whom we must eye in every thing we have to do with God. They that were at a distance, looked toward Jerusalem, for the sake of the temple, even when it was in ruins, Dan. 6:10. He begs that God would hear the prayers, and forgive the sins, of all that look this way in their prayers: not as if he thought all devout prayers by those who had no knowledge of this house, or regard to it, were therefore rejected; but he desired that the sensible tokens of the divine presence with which this house was blessed, might always sensibly encourage and comfort believing petitioners.

More particularly, he here puts divers cases in which he supposed application would be made to God by prayer, in or toward this house of prayer.

(1.) He prays that, in difficult civil or criminal matters, this throne of grace might be a throne of judgment, from which God would right the injured that believingly appealed to it, and punish the injurious that presumptuously appealed to it. v. 31, 32. It was usual to swear by the temple and altar, Matt. 23:16, 18. a corruption which perhaps took its rise from this supposition of an oath taken, not by the temple or altar, but at or near them, for the greater solemnity.

(2.) If the people of Israel were groaning under any national calamity, (v. 33, 35, 37.) or any particular Israelite under any personal calamity, (v. 38—40.) he desires the prayers they should make in or toward this house, might be heard and answered. He supposes the cause of the judgment would be sin, and nothing else. And the consequence of the judgment would be, they would cry to God, and make supplication to Him, in or toward that house. Those that slighted Him before, and [u] pray, and make supplication unto thee § in this house:

34 Then hear thou in heaven, and [x] forgive the sin of thy people Israel, and bring them again unto the land, [y] which thou gavest unto their fathers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22—30. The service of God is the highest honor of the greatest of men; and to lead others in prayer and praise, to animate and assist them in worshipping the Lord, forms the noblest employment on earth, and most resembles that of the angels in heaven. But indeed, the most exalted adorations of the noblest creatures are beneath the notice of his Infinite Majesty, and only accepted through his unspeakable condescension. With what internal awe, and external indications of reverence, should we, worthless sinners, prostrate ourselves before his glorious and holy Majesty! How should we approach his mercy-seat with admiring, adoring gratitude, and humble expectation of his invaluable and much needed benefits! and how should faith and love exalt our souls above all external objects, and raise them to heaven, his dwelling place, where He displays his glory, who fills immensity, and 'inhabiteth eternity!'—But behold, He dwells in human nature, as in his temple! there sinners may see his glory and live: and when we pray in his name, directing our faith towards that sacred residence of the Deity, He will assuredly hear, and forgive our sins, and save our souls. His 'name is Emmanuel:' 'God is in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself.' SCOTT.

Verses 28—30.

The Lord was not essentially more present in the temple than elsewhere; and the full displays of his glory were made in heaven, his throne and his dwelling-place: yet He had 'recorded his name' in the temple; and it was a peculiar type of the human nature of Christ, in whom the divine perfections are revealed, as harmonizing in the salvation of believers; and in whom 'God is reconciling the world to Himself,' dwelling among men, and accepting the services and answering the prayers of all true believers.—The sacrifices continually offered, the incense burnt, and the whole service performed at the temple, were typical of the Redeemer's offices, oblation, and intercession. The temple, therefore, must be continually adverted to in all their prayers.—Accordingly, the Israelites, when distant from Jerusalem, were accustomed to turn their faces toward it, as expressive of dependence on the services there performed by the priests, and of their communion with the worshippers of JEHOVAH: and when they were near it, they resorted thither to present their supplications. [Mohammedans have also their keblah, the temple of Mecca, toward which they pray. See Sale.] (M. R. g, h.—Dan. 6:10, 11. Jon. 2:3, 4.)—Under one word, 'forgive,' he comprised all he could ask in behalf of his people: for, as all misery springs from sin; forgiveness of sin must prepare the way for the removal of every evil, and the communication of every good; and without it, no deliverance can prove a blessing. (Ps. 32:1, 2. Rom. 4:6—8.) SCOTT.

35 ¶ When [z] heaven is shut up, and there is no rain, because they have sinned against thee; [a] if they pray toward this place, and [b] confess thy name, and [c] turn from their sin, when thou afflictest them:

36 Then hear thou in heaven, and forgive the sin of thy servants, and of thy people Israel, that [d] thou teach them [e] the good way wherein they should walk, and [f] give rain upon thy land which thou hast given to thy people for an inheritance.

37 ¶ If there be [g] in the land famine, if there be pestilence, blasting, mildew, locust, or if there be caterpillar; if their enemy besiege them in the land of their * cities; whatsoever plague, whatsoever sickness there be;

38 What [h] prayer and supplication soever be made by any man, or by all thy people Israel, which shall know every man [i] the plague of his own heart, and [j] spread forth his hands toward this house:

39 Then [k] hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place, and forgive, and do, and [l] give to every man according to his ways, whose heart thou knowest; (for [m] thou, even thou only, knowest the hearts of all the children of men;)

40 That they may [n] fear thee all the days that they live in the land which thou gavest unto our fathers.

41 ¶ Moreover, concerning [o] a stranger that is not of thy people Israel, but [p] cometh out of a far country for thy name's sake;

42 (For [q] they shall hear of thy [r] great name, and of [s] thy strong hand, and of thy stretched-out arm;) [t] when he shall come and pray towards this house:

43 Hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for; [u] that all people of the earth may know thy name, to [x] fear thee, as do thy people Israel; and that they may know that † this house, which I have builded, is called by thy name.

44 ¶ If thy people [y] go out to battle against their enemy, [z] whithersoever thou shalt send them, and [a] shall pray unto the LORD ‡ toward [b] the city which thou hast chosen, and toward the house that I have built for thy name:

45 Then hear thou in heaven their prayer and their supplication, and maintain their § cause.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31—45. It is a debt we owe to our brethren, neighbors, friends, and strangers, yea, to our enemies, to intercede for them as their cases may require; and we shall not be condemned for long prayers, if they be not formal, and rendered tedious by vain, unmeaning repetitions.—It is a comfort to the believer to reflect, how many prayers of parents, ministers, and pious friends, are laid up before God on his behalf; and how many are now praying for him in one place or other. All these shall, in due time, be answered in blessings unnumbered: nay, even whole nations, through successive generations, have reaped the benefits of the fervent supplications of a single true believer. Such intercessors form the unseen strength and bulwark of kingdoms: may the Lord increase their numbers, and may we be found among them!—Yet neither the prayers of godly friends, nor even the Savior's intercession, will benefit those who are never brought to pray earnestly for themselves. For He intercedes for those alone, who eventually are led to 'believe in his name,' and 'who come to God by Him:' and the prayers of his people, for such as continue impenitent and unbelieving, return into their own bosom. (John 17: 6—10, 20, 21.)

M. R.—17:1. 18:36—40. Jer. 14:1—6.—The same words are rendered in Chr. 'When Thou hast taught them the good way in which they should walk.' (2 Chr. 6:26, 27.)—The divine teaching particularly respects this 'good way in which we ought to walk,' and not merely notions and speculations. SCOTT.

Verse 38.

The plague, &c.] That is, 'His own sore, and his own grief.' 2 Chr. 6:29.—This interpretation doubtless includes, though it is not confined to, that meaning which is very frequently given to the expression, 'the plague of his own heart;' namely, the prevalence of indwelling sin, which as a plague, or pestilential disease, is the grief and sore of every true believer; and, in connection with the guilt which in consequence accumulates upon his conscience, brings him, day by day, to offer his fervent prayers and supplications before the mercy-seat of a forgiving God. ID.

Verse 40.

As 'there is no man that sinneth not,' (46) so no man could worship a holy God, 'if there were not forgiveness with Him.' (Gen. 22: 11, 12. Ps. 130:3, 4.) Unless this was clearly revealed, that reverential fear, which unites with hope, and leads men to repent and seek the Lord, would be extinguished, when sinners became acquainted with their own character and state, and with the perfections and holy laws of God; and that slavish fear alone would remain, which unites with enmity and despair, and drives men further and further from God and his worship. (Jam. 2:19, 20.)—It is very instructive to compare the several parts of this prayer, with the preceding prophecies, and the subsequent history; which may in good measure be done by consulting the M. R. SCOT.

There was a court built, called 'the court of the Gentiles,' which was appropriated to the use of those, who came from other nations to worship the God of Israel, but were not circumcised, and did not observe the ceremonial law.—The prejudices of the Jews, in the days of Christ, against the admission of Gentiles into the church, arose from ignorance of the Scriptures, connected with national prejudices, pharisaical pride, and bigotry; which being early imbibed, were not easily removed even from true believers. ID.

Verses 44, 45.

(M. R.) Thou shalt send, &c. (44) That is, in any just and necessary war; for God did not send the Israelites, when they were actuated by selfishness to engage in oppressive and unrighteous wars: nei

46 ¶ If they sin against thee, (for [c] there is no man that sinneth not,) and thou be angry with them, and deliver them to the enemy, so that they carry them away captives [d] unto the land of the enemy, far or near:

47 Yet [e] if they shall [*] bethink themselves in the land whither they were carried captives, and repent, and make supplication unto thee in the land of them that carried them captives, [f] saying, We have sinned, and have [g] done perversely, we have committed wickedness;

48 And so [h] return unto thee with all their heart, and with all their soul, in the land of their enemies which led them away captive, and [i] pray unto thee toward their land which thou gavest unto their fathers, [k] the city which thou hast chosen, and the house which I have built for thy name:

49 Then [l] hear thou their prayer and their supplication in heaven thy dwelling place, and maintain their [†] cause;

50 And forgive thy people that have sinned against thee, and all their transgressions wherein they have transgressed against thee, [m] and give them compassion before them who carried them captive, that they may have compassion on them:

51 For they be [n] thy people, and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest forth out of Egypt, from the midst of [o] the furnace of iron:

52 That [p] thine eyes may be open unto the supplication of thy servant, and unto the supplication of thy people Israel, to hearken unto them [q] in all that they call for unto thee.

53 For thou didst [r] separate them from among all the people of the earth, to be [s] thine inheritance, [t] as thou spakest by the hand of Moses thy servant, when thou broughtest our fathers out of Egypt, O LORD God.

54 ¶ And it was so, that, [u] when Solomon had made an end of praying all this prayer and supplication unto the LORD, he arose from before the altar of the LORD, from [v] kneeling on his knees [w] with his hands spread up to heaven.

55 And he stood, and [x] blessed all the congregation of Israel with a loud voice, saying,

56 [y] Blessed be the LORD, that [z] hath given rest unto his people Is-in the severest rebukes of his providence; no man but what is in danger of falling into gross sin, and will, if God leave him to himself. 2. He supposes what may well be expected, if Israel revolt from God, that God will be angry with them, and deliver them into the hand of their enemies, to be carried captive into a strange country, v. 46. 3. He then supposes they bethink themselves, consider their ways; for afflictions put men upon consideration; and when once they are brought to consider, they repent and pray, confess their sins, and humble themselves, (v. 47.) and return to God in the land of their enemies, whom they had forsaken in their own. 4. He supposes, that in their prayers they will look toward their own holy land, city, and house, and directs them so to do, (v. 48) for his sake, who gave them that land, chose that city, and to whose honor that house was built. 5. He prays, that then God would hear their prayers, forgive their sins, plead their cause, and incline their enemies to have compassion on them, v. 49, 50. God has all hearts in his hand, and can make their most cruel persecutors to pity his people. See this prayer answered, Ps. 106: 46. 6. He pleads their relation to God, and his interest in them, v. 51, 53.

Lastly, After all these particulars, he concludes with this general request, that God would hearken to all his praying people in all that they call unto Him for, v. 52. No place, now under the Gospel, can be imagined to add any acceptableness to the prayers made in or toward it, as the temple then did; that was a shadow, the substance is Christ; whatever we ask in his name, it shall be given us.

ther could they reasonably expect his assistance in them. It does not indeed appear from their history, that they were much engaged in such wars: and many circumstances, arising from the tenure of their lands, and other judicial regulations, as well as their religious ordinances, tending to constitute Israel a nation of agriculturists, powerfully counteracted the pernicious natural propensity of fallen man, both rulers and people, to make war their favorite and most honorable employment. Verses 46—53.

This concluding part of Solomon's intercession was evidently answered, in the restoration of the Jews after the Babylonish captivity. (Lev. 26:38—45. Deut. 4:29—31. Neh. 1:5—11. Jer. 29:11—14. Ez. 36:25—32.) Though the temple and city lay in ruins; yet when they bethought themselves, and repented, and prayed in the land of Chaldea, towards the land of Israel; the Lord heard, forgave, and restored them to their own land. (Dan. 9:1—19.) But it will hereafter receive another more remarkable answer, when the Jews shall be gathered from their present dispersion, become a part of the Christian church, and probably be reinstated in their own country.—All Solomon's arguments, in this plea for his people, were deduced from the Lord's choice of them, his separation of them from other nations to be his inheritance, and the favors which He had already conferred on them: and all inseparably connecting their returning peace and prosperity, with their deep humiliation, true repentance, conversion, and fervent prayer. (Zech. 12:9—14.)—It appears from Chr. that Solomon concluded with a passage taken from one of the Psalms. (2 Chr. 6:41, 42.)—There is no man that sinneth not. (46) Ec. 7:19, 20. Rom. 3:21—26. Jam. 3:1, 2. 1 John 1:8—10. 3:4—6. SCOTT.

(Josh. 21:43—45. 23:14—16.) Incline, &c. (58) No blessing can be expected, whilst men continue wilfully disobedient. No human heart is of itself inclined to obey the call to repentance, faith, and newness of life, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord. The first benefit communicated to sinners, through the intercession of Him whom Solomon typified, is 'the inclining of the heart to this obedience.' 'Lord have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.' Communion service.—'As by thy special grace preventing us, Thou dost put into our hearts good desires.' Col.

57 The [b] LORD our God be with us, as he was with our fathers: let him not leave us, nor forsake us:

58 That he may [c] incline our hearts unto him, to walk in all his ways, and to keep [d] his commandments, and his statutes, and his judgments, which he commanded our fathers.

59 And let these my words, wherewith I have made supplication before the LORD, be [e] nigh unto the LORD our God day and night, that he maintain the cause of his servant, and the cause of his people Israel [†] at all times, [f] as the matter shall require;

60 That [g] all the people of the earth may know that [h] the LORD is God, and that there is none else.

61 Let your heart therefore be [i] perfect with the LORD our God, to walk in his statutes, and to keep his commandments, as at this day.

62 ¶ And [j] the king, and all Israel with him, offered sacrifice before the LORD.

63 And Solomon offered [k] a sacrifice of peace-offerings, which he offered unto the LORD, two and twenty thousand oxen, and an hundred and twenty thousand sheep. So the king and all the children of Israel [l] dedicated the house of the LORD.

64 The same day did the king [m] hallow the middle of the court that was before the house of the LORD: for there he offered burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, and the fat of the peace-offerings: because [n] the brazen altar that was before the LORD was too little to receive the burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, and the fat of the peace-offerings.

65 And at that time Solomon [o] held a feast, and all Israel with him, [p] a great congregation, [q] from the entering in of Hamath unto [r] the river of Egypt, before the LORD our God, [s] seven days and seven days, even fourteen days.

66 On [t] the eighth day he sent the people away: and they [‡] blessed the king, and went unto their tents, [u] joyful and glad of heart for all the goodness that the LORD had done for David his servant, and for Israel his people.

more fully spoken, or more pertinently; never was congregation dismissed with that which was more likely to affect them and abide with them.

I. He gives God the glory of the great and kind things He had done for Israel, v. 56. He blesses God who has given, he does not say wealth, honor, power, victory, to Israel; but rest, as if that were a blessing more valuable: let not those who have rest, undervalue that blessing, then, though they want some other. He compares their blessings with the promises; does, as it were, write a receipt in full on the back of these bonds, to the everlasting honor of the divine faithfulness, and the everlasting encouragement of all those that build on the divine promises.

II. He blesses himself and the congregation, expressing his earnest desire and hope of these four things. 1. The presence of God with them, (v. 57.) that is all in all to the happiness of a church and nation, and of every particular person. 2. The power of his grace on them; 'Let Him be with us, not to enlarge our coasts, and increase our wealth, but to incline our hearts to Himself,' v. 58. Spiritual blessings are the best, which we should covet earnestly: our hearts are naturally averse to our duty, and apt to decline from God; it is his grace that inclines them, grace that must be obtained by prayer. 3. An answer to this his prayer, v. 59. Let a gracious return be made to every prayer that shall be made here, and that will be a continual answer to this prayer. What Solomon here asks for his prayer, is still granted in the intercession of Christ, which his supplication typified; that powerful, prevailing intercession is before the Lord our God day and night; for our great Advocate attends continually to this very thing, and we may depend on Him to maintain our cause, on all occasions, as the matter shall require, so as to speak for us the word of the day in its day, (as the original is here,) from which we shall receive grace sufficient, suitable, and seasonable, in every time of need. 4. The glorifying of God in the enlargement of his kingdom among men. Let Israel be thus blessed, thus favored; not that all people may become tributaries to us, but that all people may know that the Lord is God, and He only, and may come and worship Him, v. 60. With this, Solomon's prayers, like the prayers of his father, are ended; (Ps. 72: 19, 20.) Let the whole earth be filled with his glory: we cannot close our prayers with a better summary than this, Father, glorify thy name.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 46—66. We are, alas! all sinners, and sin is the cause of all calamities public and personal; and unless forsaken and forgiven, it must terminate in final misery. But when the vilest transgressor bethinks himself, and examines his heart and life; when he is humbled before God, and penitently confesses that he has sinned, has done perversely, and committed wickedness; when he returns to the Lord with his whole heart, and prays unto Him, in the Savior's name: then he has begun to receive the benefit of his intercession, and the Father will hear in heaven his supplication, and maintain his cause. Then, whatever be his grief, his burden and terror, and 'the plague of his own heart,' the guilt of his conscience, the depravity of his nature, his evil habits, the force of temptation, or the pressure of affliction, he will bring it, and spread it in secret before a heart-searching and merciful God: thus he will obtain pardon and peace, and learn to love and fear the Lord all his days. In this manner the Israel of God is established and sanctified, and the backslider is recovered and healed; the stranger is brought nigh, and the mourner comforted; the name of God is glorified, and numbers are added to the church of such as shall be saved.—By the example of Israel, other nations should be warned and instructed: public affairs should be managed in the spirit of faith and devotion: public calamities should excite to national repentance, reformation, and prayer: and these things would best secure public peace and prosperity. The same should be the conduct of churches, families, and individuals.—May 'the Lord then incline our hearts unto Him, that we may walk in all his ways, and keep his commandments and statutes;' may we abound in his work, and stir up others to do the same: may we love the Lord, and do good to and pray for one another, and rejoice together for all the goodness, that the Lord has done for us and for his people! Then shall we enjoy some of the days of heaven on earth, and be continually preparing for that world, where the feast of holy love and joy will be unalloyed and eternal.

This, therefore, we should beg of God for others, and for ourselves, when we perceive our need of it: for when this is granted all else will follow. Yet Solomon afterwards exhorted the people to be 'perfect with the LORD, &c.' CHAP. IX.

God appears again to Solomon, and makes a covenant with him, 1—9. Transactions between Solomon and Hiram, 10—14. Solomon builds or rebuilds several cities, 15—19. He subjects the remnant of the Canaanites to bond-service, and employs the Israelites in more honorable offices, 20—23. Pharaoh's daughter removes to her house, 24. Solomon sacrifices thrice every year, 25. His navy fetches gold from Ophir, 26—28.

AND [a] it came to pass, when Solomon had finished the building of the house of the LORD, and the king's house, and [c] all Solomon's desire which he was pleased to do;

2 That the LORD appeared to Solomon the second time, [d] as he had appeared unto him at Gibeon.

3 And the LORD said unto him, [e] I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication, that thou hast made before me: [f] I have hallowed this house, which thou hast built, [g] to put my name there for ever: and [h] mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually.

4 And [i] if thou wilt walk before me, as David thy father walked, in integrity of heart, and in uprightness, to do according to all that I have commanded thee, and wilt keep my statutes and my judgments:

5 Then [k] I will establish the throne of thy kingdom upon Israel for ever, as I promised to David thy father, saying, There shall not fail thee a man upon the throne of Israel.

6 But [l] if ye shall at all turn from following me, ye or your children, and will not keep my commandments and my statutes which I have set before you, but [m] go and serve other gods, and worship them:

7 Then [n] will I cut off Israel out of the land which I have given them; and [o] this house, which I have hallowed for my name, will I cast out of my sight; and [p] Israel shall be a proverb and a by-word among all people:

8 And at [q] this house, which is high, every one that passeth by it shall be astonished, and shall hiss; and they shall say, [r] Why hath the LORD done thus unto this land, and to this house?

9 And they shall answer, [s] Because they forsook the LORD their God, who brought forth their fathers out of the land of Egypt, and have taken hold upon other gods, and have worshipped them, and served them: therefore hath the LORD brought

III. He solemnly charges his people to continue and persevere in duty to God, (v. 61.) 'Let your obedience be universal without dividing, upright without dissembling, and constant without declining;' this is evangelical perfection.

V. 62—66. We read before, that Judah and Israel were eating and drinking, and very cheerful, under their own vines and fig-trees; here we have them so in God's courts; now they found Solomon's words true concerning wisdom's ways, that they are ways of pleasantness.

1. They had abundant joy and satisfaction, while they attended at God's house, for there, (1.) Solomon offered a great sacrifice, v. 63. enough to have drained the country of cattle, if it had not been a very fruitful land. When Moses dedicated his altar, the peace-offerings were 24 bullocks; rams, goats, and lambs, 180; (Num. 7: 88.) then the people were poor, but now they were increased in wealth, more was expected; where God sows plentifully, He must reap accordingly. All these sacrifices could not be offered in one day, but in the several days of the feast; thirty oxen a day served Solomon's table, but thousands shall go to God's altar; few are thus minded, to spend more on their souls than on their bodies. The brazen altar was not large enough to receive all these sacrifices, so that, to serve the present occasion, they were forced to offer many of them in the middle of the court, v. 64. Some think, on altars of earth or stone, erected for the purpose, and taken down when the solemnity was over; others think, on the bare ground: they that will be generous in serving God, need not stint themselves for want of room and occasion. (2.) He kept a feast, the feast of tabernacles, as it should seem, after the feast of dedication, and both together lasted 14 days; (v. 65.) yet they said not, Behold, what a weariness is it!

2. They carried this joy and satisfaction with them to their own houses. They rejoiced in God's blessing, both on the royal family and on the kingdom; thus should we go home, rejoicing, from holy ordinances, and go on our way, rejoicing for God's goodness to our Lord Jesus, (of whom David his servant was a type,) in the advancement and establishment of his throne, pursuant to the covenant of redemption, and to all believers, his spiritual Israel, in their sanctification and consolation, pursuant to the covenant of grace; if we rejoice not herein always, it is our own fault.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—9. God had given a real answer to Solomon's prayer, and tokens of his acceptance of it immediately, by the fire from heaven which consumed the sacrifices; (as we find, 2 Chr. 7: 1.) but here we have a more express and distinct answer to it. Observe,

I. How God appeared to him, as at Gibeon, in a dream or vision, v. 2. The comparing of it with that, intimates it was the very night after he had finished the solemnities of his festival, for so that was, 2 Chr. 1: 6, 7. And then v. 1. speaking of Solomon's finishing all his buildings, which was not till many years after the dedication of the temple, must be read thus, Solomon finished; (as it is 2 Chr. 7: 11.) and v. 2. must be read, and the Lord had appeared.

II. Its purport. 1. He assures him of his special presence in the temple, in answer to his prayer, v 3. Men cannot make a place holy, yet what we, in sincerity, devote to God, we may hope He will graciously accept, as his. Apply it to persons, the living temples; those whom God hallows or sanctifies, whom He sets apart for Himself, have his eye, his heart, his love and care, and this, perpetually.

2. He shows him that he and his people were, for the future, on their good behavior; let them not be secure now, as if they might live as they please, now they have the temple of the Lord among them, Jer. 7: 4. God deals plainly with us, sets before us good and evil. God here tells Solomon,

(1.) The establishment of his kingdom depended on the constancy of his obedience, v. 4, 5. for on that condition the promise was made, Ps. 132: 12. If we perform our part of the covenant, God will not fail to perform his; if we improve the grace God has given us, He will confirm us to the end.

(2.) The ruin of his kingdom would be the certain consequence of his or his children's apostasy from God; v. 6. At all, &c. v. 6. it is thought should be read, altogether; 'if you shall altogether turn from following Me.' Forsaking God's service, deserting his altar, and going to serve other gods, was the covenant-breaking sin. They prided themselves in the stateliness and magnificence of the temple, but let them know it is not so high as to be out of the reach of God's judgments, if they vilify it so as to exchange it for groves and idol-temples, and yet, at the same time, magnify it so as to think it secures the favor of God to them, though they ever so much corrupt themselves; and the guilty, self-convicted, self-condemned, Israelites, will be forced to acknowledge, with shame, that they themselves were its ruin; for when it shall be asked, Why hath the Lord done thus to this house? they cannot but answer, It was because they forsook the Lord their God. See Deut. 29: 24, 25. Their sin will be read in their punishment.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. Solomon did not finish his other buildings, till above 12 years after the dedication of the temple; (10. Note, 7:1.) and it is exceedingly improbable, that this gracious appearance of God to him was delayed so long. Some expositors therefore render these verses, 'And it was, that thus Solomon finished,' &c.—'And the LORD appeared,' &c.—The two subjects are kept entirely distinct in Chr. (2 Chr. 7:11, 12.)—The encouragement given Solomon, while building the temple, (6:11—13.) was either sent by a prophet, or given in an answer by the high-priest: for this was only the second appearance of God to him. (3:5—14.) SCOTT.

Verses 4—6.

Solomon and his posterity, and Israel in that and future ages, were alike concerned in these promises and warnings. The obedience intended in all such declarations, is the unreserved, though imperfect, obedience of a penitent believer; by which he evidences his cordial acceptance of unmerited mercies, and aims to glorify the God of his salvation. SCOTT.

Verses 7—9.

These denunciations were remarkably fulfilled during the Babylonish captivity; but the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the state of the Jews to this very day, are the most extraordinary upon them all this evil.

10 ¶ And it came to pass [t] at the end of twenty years, when Solomon had built the two houses, the house of the LORD, and the king's house,

11 (Now [u] Hiram the king of Tyre had furnished Solomon with cedar-trees and fir-trees, and with gold, according to all his desire,) that then [v] king Solomon gave Hiram twenty cities in the land [x] of Galilee.

12 And Hiram came out from Tyre to see the cities which Solomon had given him; and * they pleased him not.

13 And he said, What cities are these which thou hast given me, [y] my brother? And he called them the land of * Cabul unto this day.

14 And Hiram [z] sent to the king six-score talents of gold.

15 ¶ And this is [a] the reason of the levy which king Solomon raised; for [b] to build the house of the LORD, and his own house, and [c] Millo, and the wall of Jerusalem, and [d] Hazor, and * Megiddo, and [f] Gezer.

16 For Pharaoh king of Egypt had gone up, and taken Gezer, and burnt it with fire, and slain the Canaanites that dwelt in the city, and given it for a present unto his [g] daughter, Solomon's wife.

17 And Solomon built Gezer, and [h] Beth-horon the nether,

V. 10—14. Solomon's agreement with Hiram, when the building-work was to be begun, we read before, ch. 5. Here we have an account of their fair and friendly parting, when the work was done.

1. Hiram made good his bargain, v. 11, 14. So far from envying Solomon's growing greatness and reputation, and being jealous of him, he helped to magnify him; Solomon's power, with Solomon's wisdom, needs not to be dreaded by any of his neighbors; God honors him, therefore Hiram will.

2. Solomon, no doubt, made good his bargain, and gave Hiram food for his household, as was agreed, ch. 5: 9. But here we are told that, over and above that, he gave him 20 cities, (small ones we may suppose, like those mentioned here, v. 19.) in the land of Galilee, v. 11. It should seem, they were not allotted to any of the tribes of Israel, (for the border of Asher came up to them, Josh. 19: 27. which intimates that it did not include them,) but continued in the hands of the natives, till Solomon mastered them, and made a present of them to Hiram; it becomes those that are great and good, to be generous. Hiram came to see these cities, and did not like them, v. 12. Solomon afterward repaired them, and then caused the children of Israel to inhabit them; 2 Chr. 8: 2. which intimates that, before, they did not; Solomon, no doubt, honorably gave Hiram an equivalent in something else. But the cities were not agreeable to Hiram's genius; the Tyrians were merchants, trading men, that lived in fine houses, and became rich by navigation, but knew not how to value a country that was fit for corn and pasture, that was business out of their way; therefore Hiram desired Solomon to take them again; he called the country the land of Cabul, a Phenician word (so Josephus) signifying displeasing, v. 3. he knew not what to do with them, and if he would please to gratify him, let it be in his own element, by becoming his partner in trade, as we find he did, v. 27. See how the providence of God suits both the accommodation of this earth to the various dispositions of men, and the dispositions of men to the various accommodations of the earth, and all for the good of mankind in general; in which observe the wisdom of Him whose all souls are, and all lands.

V. 15—28. We have here a further account of Solomon's greatness:

I. His buildings. Perhaps there was some complaint of the heaviness of the taxes, (v. 15.) which the historian excuses from the greatness of his undertakings; he raised it not for war, as other princes, but for building. Solomon verily began his work at the right end, he built God's house first; if we begin with God, He will go on with us; let the first-fruits be his, and the after-fruits will the more comfortably be ours, Matt 6: 33. Those consult not their own interest, that defer to the last what they design for pious uses.

The further order in Solomon's buildings is observable: God's house first, for religion; then his own, for his own convenience; then a house for his wife, to which she removed, as soon as it was ready for her; (v. 24.) then Millo, the Town-house, or Guild-hall; then the wall of Jerusalem, the royal city; then some cities of note and strength in the country, which were decayed and unfortified, Hazor, Megiddo, &c. These he rebuilt at his own charge. Among the rest, he built Gezer, which Pharaoh took out of the hands of the Canaanites, and made a present of to his daughter, Solomon's wife, v. 16. Then he built cities for convenience, for store, for his chariots, and for his horsemen, v. 19. And lastly, he built for pleasure in Lebanon, for his hunting perhaps, or other diversions there.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. The Lord is ever ready to hear the prayers which we make before Him, and to manifest his acceptance of our upright services: and when we present ourselves, in body and soul, to be consecrated as the temples of the Holy Spirit, to his glory, He will hallow and sanctify us by his grace, and render us meet to be a holy habitation for Himself; though before we were altogether polluted. (Eph. 2: 19—22.) In and through Jesus Christ, his eyes and his heart are always on every true believer, to watch over him, and to rejoice in doing him good; yet it is only at intervals, that He manifests his presence, and lifts up the light of his countenance upon him: but in heaven we shall always behold his face, and be filled with unalloyed, uninterrupted felicity.—After all the services which we can perform, we stand on the same terms with the Lord as before: nothing can purchase for us an exemption from obedience, or a dispensation to sin, in any case whatever: nor would the true believer desire such a license. As for those, who merely call themselves Christians, of every sect and creed, who make their forms and notions an excuse for breaking God's commandments, they will ere long be exposed to universal and everlasting contempt.—The conduct of individuals, of churches, and nations, who are exposed to great calamities, when carefully considered, will always sufficiently answer the inquiry, 'Why hath the LORD done this unto them?' Nay, even infidels and profligates frequently justify God in the punishment of unrighteous professors of religion, though not without casting unwarrantable scoffs and insults upon them.—Parents, who set their children good examples and give them good instructions, are warranted to hope, that their prayers for them will be answered, and the blessings of the covenant entailed upon them. (Gen. 18: 18, 19.) But the examples of those, whose sins are recorded in their punishment, may be equally instructive.—The present dispersed and despised state of the Jews is both a demonstration of the truth of the Scriptures, and a daily instruction and warning to us, not to trust in outward privileges, not to trifle with the commandments of God, and not to neglect the salvation of the Gospel. We have indeed a better covenant, founded on better promises, than that made with the nation of Israel: but let us see to it, that it is really made with us; and that the law of God is written in our hearts, as the proof that our iniquities are forgiven. If this be the case, our persevering obedience, as well as faith in the Savior, is provided for; and the Lord 'will put his fear into our hearts, that we may never depart from Him.' Hiram had furnished Solomon with timber, not only for building the temple, but also for his own house, and his many other magnificent works: and he likewise 'had sent him 120 talents of gold;' for that seems to be the proper construction of v. 14. Solomon therefore was indebted to Hiram, beyond the corn and wine and oil agreed upon: (5:11.) and he gave him twenty cities in Galilee as a compensation. They seem to have been small towns in the vicinity of Tyre, beyond the boundaries of the land, as divided by Joshua, and lately taken from the ancient inhabitants. Probably they lay in ruins. ED.

19 And all [l] the cities of store that Solomon had, and cities for his chariots, and cities for his horsemen, and * that which Solomon desired to build in Jerusalem, and in Lebanon, and in all the land of his dominion.

20 And all the people, that were [m] left of the [n] Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, which were not of the children of Israel;

21 Their children [o] that were left after them in the land, whom the children of Israel also were [p] not able utterly to destroy, upon those did Solomon [q] levy a tribute [r] of bond-service unto this day.

22 But [s] of the children of Israel did Solomon make no bondmen: [t] but they were men of war, and his servants, and his princes, and his captains, and rulers of his chariots, and his horsemen.

23 These were the [u] chief of the officers that were over Solomon's work, five hundred and fifty, which bare rule over the people that wrought in the work.

24 But [x] Pharaoh's daughter came up out of [y] the city of David unto her house which Solomon had built for her: then did he build [z] Millo.

25 And [a] three times in a year did Solomon offer burnt-offerings and peace-offerings upon the altar which he built unto the LORD, and [b] he burnt incense † upon the altar that was before the LORD. [c] So he finished the house.

26 ¶ And king Solomon [d] made a navy of ships in [e] Ezion-geber, which is beside [f] Eloth, on the ‡ shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom.

27 And Hiram sent in the navy [g] his servants, shipmen that had knowledge of the sea, with the servants of Solomon.

28 And they came to [h] Ophir, and fetched from thence gold, [i] four hundred and twenty talents, and brought it to king Solomon.

I. His workmen and servants. In doing such great works, he must needs employ abundance of workmen. The honor of great men is borrowed from their inferiors, who do that which they have the credit of.

1. Solomon [as was often done of old] employed those which remained of the conquered and devoted nations, in all the slavish work, v. 20, 21. We may suppose they renounced their idolatry, and submitted to Solomon's government, so that he could not, in honor, destroy them, and were so poor, that he could not levy money on them, therefore he served himself of their labor. Herein he observed God's law, (Lev. 25: 44.) Thy bondmen shall be of the heathen; and fulfilled Noah's curse on Canaan, A servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren, Gen. 9: 25.

2. He employed Israelites in the more creditable services, v. 22, 23. they were God's freemen; but he made them soldiers and courtiers, and gave them offices, as he saw them qualified, among his chariots and horsemen, appointing some to support the service of the inferior laborers. Thus he preserved the dignity and liberty of Israel, and honored their relation to God as a kingdom of priests.

III. His piety and devotion, v. 25. he offered burnt-offerings extraordinary: namely, at the three yearly feasts, the passover, pentecost, and feast of tabernacles, in honor of the divine institution; beside what he offered at other times, both statedly, and on special occasions. With his sacrifices he burnt incense, not himself, (that was king Uzziah's crime,) but the priest for him, at his charge, and for his particular use. It is said, He offered on the altar which he himself built. He did not think his building an altar would excuse him from sacrificing, but rather engage him the more to it. Whatever pains we take, for the support of religion, to the glory of God, and the edification of others, we ourselves are likely to have the advantage of it.

IV. His merchandise. He built a fleet of trading ships, at Ezion-geber, (v. 26.) a port on the coast of the Red Sea, the furthest stage of the Israelites, when they wandered in the wilderness, Num. 33: 35. That wilderness, probably, now began to be peopled by the Edomites, which it was not then. To them this port had belonged, but David having subdued the Edomites, it now pertained to the crown of Judah. The fleet traded to Ophir in the East Indies; supposed to be what is now called Ceylon: [others suppose it to be the E. coast of Africa:] gold was the com-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 10—28. Men are, and will be, of different judgments and dispositions; and they may be allowed to differ in all temporal matters, and in some things which pertain to the worship of God: but as all believers come to the mercy-seat of their reconciled Father, by Christ the living Way, and through his propitiation, and intercession; and as they all choose and delight in the same spiritual excellency of heavenly things; in these respects, they must and will be of one mind and of one judgment.—Nothing is truly valuable, but in proportion as it is useful: and that is most valuable which promotes the salvation of souls.—Few can resist the fascinating temptations of great prosperity; it gradually fosters pride and sensual indulgence, and eats out the life and power of godliness: and most of those, who have risen to great honor and affluence, after having given satisfactory evidence of real godliness, have evidently shown that their souls were losers in proportion. Let the rich and prosperous, then, 'rejoice with trembling,' and take heed lest they forget the Lord; and let the poor and obscure be thankful for their safer condition! (*P. O. Tadmor in the wilderness.] This is supposed to have been the same with the city Palmyra, the magnificent ruins of which, in the midst of widely extended plains of barren sands, attract the attention, and excite the admiration, of modern travellers and antiquarians. But the architecture of these ruins, being evidently Grecian, does not allow us to suppose that they are the remains of buildings erected by Solomon; for they must be of much later date. SCOTT.

It was important as the bulwark of Judea against the wandering tribes from the Euphrates; and as the emporium of the commerce of E. and W. Asia, it was a large and opulent city in Trajan's time, who subjected the whole province (Palmyrene) to the Roman power. It was adorned with magnificent palaces, whose ruins still excite admiration, though it has been twice destroyed; under Zenobia, by Aurelian, in 275, and by the Saracens, in 744. These are described in the magnificent work of Wood, the Ruins of Palmyra. Among them are many beautiful columns, and remains of temples and towers, all admirably wrought of marble. The Temple of the Sun is the most beautiful. Palmyra, under its old name Tadmor, is now a village, and some poor families have built their huts amidst its magnificent ruins. modity traded for, substantial wealth. It should seem, Solomon had, before, been Hiram's partner, or put a venture into his ships, (v. 14.) that encouraged him to build a fleet of his own. The success of others, in any employment, should quicken our industry; for in all labor there is profit. Solomon sent his own servants for factors, and merchants, and super-cargoes, but hired Tyrians for sailors, for they had knowledge of the sea, v. 27. Thus one nation needs another; not only as Christians, but as men, we are members one of another. Canaan, the holy land, the glory of all lands, had no gold in it: which teaches us that that part of the wealth of this world, which is for hoarding and trading, is not the best part of it, but that which is more immediately for the present support and comfort of life, our own and others; such were the productions of Canaan. Solomon got much by his merchandise, and yet has directed us to a better trade, within reach of the poorest, having assured us, from his own experience of both, that the merchandise of Wisdom is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold.

CHAP. X. Still Solomon looks great, and every thing in this ch. adds to his magnificence. We read nothing indeed of his charity, of no hospitals he built, or alms-houses; he made his kingdom so rich, that it did not need them; yet, no question, many poor were relieved from the abundance of his table. A church he had built, never to be equalled; schools or colleges he need not build any, his own palace is an academy, and his court a rendezvous of wise and learned men, as well as the centre of all the circulating riches of that part of the world. So that, putting all together, it must be owned, as it is here said, (v. 23.) that king Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches, and for wisdom. Yet where Christ is, by his Word and Spirit, behold, a greater than Solomon is there.

V. 1—13. We have here an account of the queen of Sheba's visit to Solomon, no doubt, when in the height of his piety and prosperity. Our Savior calls her the queen of the South, for Sheba lay S. from Canaan. The common opinion is, it was in Africa; and the Christians in Ethiopia, to this day, are confident she came from their country, and that Candace, mentioned, Acts 8: 27. was her successor. But it is more probable she came from the S. part of Arabia the Happy. It should seem, she was a queen-regent, sovereign of her country. Observe,

I. Her errand; not to treat of trade or commerce, to adjust the limits of their dominions, to court his alliance for their mutual strength, or his assistance against some common enemy, the common occasions of the congress of crowned heads, and their interviews: but to satisfy her curiosity; and to prove him, whether he was so great a man as he was reported to be, v. 1. His fleet sailed near the coast of her country, and, probably, might put in there for fresh water: perhaps it was thus she heard of the fame of Solomon. She came to receive instruction; also, to hear his wisdom, and thereby to improve her own, (Matt. 12: 42.) that she might the better govern her kingdom. Those whom God has called to any public employment, particularly in the magistracy and ministry, should, by all means possible, improve themselves in that knowledge which will more and more qualify them for it, and enable them to discharge their trust well. But, it should seem, what she chiefly aimed at was, to be instructed in the things of God; she was religiously inclined, and had heard not only of the fame of Solomon, but concerning the name of the Lord, (v. 1.) the great name of that God whom Solomon worshipped, and from whom he received his wisdom, and with this God she desired to be better acquainted. Therefore does our Savior mention her inquiries after God, by Solomon, as aggravating the stupidity of those who inquire not after God, by our Lord Jesus Christ, though He, having lain in his bosom, was much better able to instruct them.

II. Her equipage; a very great retinue, agreeable to her rank, intending to try Solomon's wealth and generosity, as well as his wisdom, what entertainment he could, and would, give to a royal visitant, v. 2. Yet she came not as one begging, but brought enough to bear her charges; nothing mean or common, but gold, and precious stones, and spices, because she came to trade for wisdom, which she would purchase at any rate.

III. What entertainment Solomon gave her; he despised her not, nor blamed her; but bid her welcome, and all her train; allowed her to commune with him of all that was in her heart, (v. 2.) and gave her a satisfactory answer to all her questions, (v. 3.) whether natural, moral, political, or divine. He informed her, no doubt, with particular care, concerning God, and his law and instituted worship, that she might be persuaded to serve the Lord whom now she sought.

IV. How she was affected with what she saw and heard in Solomon's court. Divers things are here mentioned which she admired; the buildings and furniture of his palace; the provision made every day for his table; the orderly sitting of his servants, and the ready attendance of his ministers, without confusion, their rich liveries, and the propriety with which his cup-bearers waited at table; these things she admired, as adding much to his magnificence. But above all these, his wisdom, (v. 4.) and the last, which crowned all, his piety, the ascent by which he went up to the house of the Lord, with what gravity and seriousness, and an air of devotion in his countenance, he appeared, when he went to the temple, to wor-

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. Cush, the son of Ham, had a descendant called Seba, and, probably, he settled in Africa, to the S. of Egypt. (Gen. 10: 6, 7.) Eber also had a descendant called Sheba; and Abraham, a grandson by Keturah, called by the same name. (Gen. 10:28. 25:1—3.) On these and other accounts, it has been controverted, whether the queen of Sheba came from some part of Ethiopia in Africa, or from the most remote region of Arabia, near the Indian ocean, in Asia.—Tradition favors the former opinion, but then it is blended with manifest falsehoods. [See Dr. A. Clarke.] Our Lord says, 'The queen of the south came from the uttermost part of the earth, to hear the wisdom of Solomon:' and Ethiopia is more distant from Jerusalem than any part of Arabia; but at the same time it does not so well answer the description, 'the uttermost part of the earth.' (Matt. 12:42. Note, Deut. 30 13.) Learned men are therefore now generally of opinion, that Sheba lay in the most southern part of Arabia Felix, between the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean; that the queen of Sheba was descended from Abraham by Keturah, and retained some traditional fragments of true religion; and that she had heard the fame of Solomon from the mariners of the fleet to Ophir, which had put into some of her ports: and indeed the more general connection, in which the name Sheba is used, in the subsequent part of Scripture, powerfully confirms this conclusion. (M. R. b.)—Our Lord's testimony, to the motives which influenced the queen of Sheba, sufficiently refutes the disadvantageous surmises which have often been entertained and advanced. She 'had heard of the fame of Solomon, concerning the name of the LORD,' and she came 'to hear his wisdom.' The report of his knowledge in the truth and precepts of religion, of his piety and zeal in the worship of JEHOVAH, and of the wisdom given him, peculiarly attracted her attention: and she came to propose many questions to him, which perplexed her mind, upon those important subjects; she could meet with no one, who could clear them up to her; and she desired 'to prove him,' whether he could or not. This shows that she was used to reflect seriously on religion; but for want of proper instruction, was not able to obtain satisfactory solutions of her difficulties: and considering her sex and rank, and the magnificence and indulgence in which she might have lived at home; her long journey, undertaken for these purposes, formed a strong proof of a pious and ingenuous mind, which knew the value of true wisdom, and was willing 'to buy the truth' at any price. [Practical Observations.]

6 And she said to the king, It was a true ‡ report that I heard in mine own land of thy § acts and of thy wisdom.

7 Howbeit [p] I believed not the words, until I came, and mine eyes had seen it: and behold, the half was not told me: ‖ thy wisdom and prosperity exceedeth the fame which I heard.

8 Happy are thy men, [q] happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee, and that hear thy wisdom.

9 [r] Blessed be the LORD thy God, which [s] delighted in thee, to set thee on the throne of Israel: [t] because the LORD loved Israel for ever, therefore made he thee king, [u] to do judgment and justice.

10 And [v] she gave the king an hundred and twenty talents of gold, and of [x] spices very great store, [y] and precious stones: there came no more such abundance of spices as these which the queen of Sheba gave to king Solomon.

11 And the navy also of Hiram that brought gold from [z] Ophir, brought in from Ophir great plenty of [a] almug-trees, and precious stones.

12 And the king made of the almug-trees ¶ pillars for the house of the LORD, and for the king's house, [b] harps also and psalteries for singers: there came no such almug-trees, nor were seen unto this day.

13 And king Solomon gave unto the queen of Sheba [c] all her desire whatsoever she asked, beside that  which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty. So she turned and went to her ship God; with as much humility then, as majesty at other times. Many of the ancient versions [as the Vulg. Sept. Chal. Syr. and Arab.] read it, The burnt-offerings which he offered in the house of the Lord: [and so Luther] she observed with what a generous bounty he brought his sacrifices, and with what a pious fervor he attended the offering of them; never did she see so much goodness with so much greatness. Every thing was so surprising, that there was no more spirit in her, but she stood amazed; she had never seen the like.

V. How she expressed herself on this occasion.

1. She owned her expectation far outdone, though highly raised by report, v. 6, 7. Usually, things are represented, both by common fame and our own imagination much greater than we find them when examined; but here the truth exceeded both fame and fancy. Those who, through grace, are brought to experience the delights of communion with God, will say the one half was not told them of the pleasures of Wisdom's ways, and the advantages of her gates. Glorified saints, much more, will say it was a true report they heard of the happiness of heaven, but that the thousandth part was not told them, 1 Cor. 2: 9.

2. She pronounced them happy, that constantly attended him, and waited on him, v. 8. She was tempted to envy them, and wish herself one of them. Note, It is a great advantage to be in good families, and to have opportunity of frequent converse with those that are wise, good, and communicative. Many have this happiness, who know not how to value it. With much more reason may we say this of Christ's servants, Blessed are they that dwell in his house, they will be still praising Him.

3. She blessed God, the Giver of Solomon's wisdom, wealth, and advancement. Solomon's preferment began in the prophet's calling him Jedidiah, because the Lord loved him, 2 Sam. 12: 25. It more than doubles our comforts, if we have reason to hope they come from God's delight in us. It was his pleasure concerning thee, (so it may be read,) to set thee on the throne; not for thy merit's sake, but because so it seemed good unto Him. 'He has made thee king, not that thou mayest live in pomp and pleasure, and do what thou wilt, but to do judgment and justice.' This she kindly reminded Solomon of, and, no doubt, he took it kindly. Both magistrates and ministers must be more solicitous to do the duty, than to secure the honors and profits of their places. To this she attributes his prosperity, not to his wisdom, for bread is not always to the wise, but whoso doeth judgment and justice, it shall be well with him, Jer. 22: 15.

VI. How they parted. 1. She made a noble present to Solomon, v. 10. David had foretold concerning Solomon, that to him should be given of the gold of Sheba, Ps. 72: 15. The present of gold and spices the wise men of the east brought to Christ, was signified by this, Matt. 2: 11. Let those that are taught of God, give Him their hearts, and the present will be more acceptable than this of gold and spices. Mention is made of the great abundance Solomon had of his own, notwithstanding she presented, and he accepted, this gold. What we present to Christ, He needs not, but will have us so to express our gratitude. The almug-trees are here spoken of, (v. 11, 12.) as extraordinary, because, perhaps, much admired by the queen of Sheba. 2. Solomon was not behindhand with her. He gave her whatsoever she asked, patterns, we may suppose, of curious things, by which she might make the like; or, perhaps, he gave her his precepts of wisdom and piety in writing, beside that which he gave her of his royal bounty, v. 13. Thus they who apply themselves

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. Wisdom and piety are exceedingly valuable, and those, who form a due estimate of their worth, will think no expense or labor too great to obtain them.—When we first attend seriously to religion, we meet with many 'hard questions,' which we cannot resolve, and which often perplex and distress our minds, especially if at a distance from proper instructions. But 'then shall we know, if we follow on to know the LORD;' and by consulting wise and experienced Christians, we shall be delivered from our difficulties, and a clearer light will shine on our path. (Prov. 4: 18, 19. Is. 42: 13—17. Hos. 6: 1—3. John 7: 14—17.)—Those who possess wisdom and knowledge, ought to be courteous and accessible, and glad to communicate them for the good of others; even as the rich should be to impart their wealth.—Our greatest diligence, constancy, seriousness, and cheerfulness, should be manifested, in attending on the ordinances of God; that our example may influence others to 'serve Him in reverence and godly fear.' This gives a lustre to wisdom, learning, wealth, or greatness: but alas! how few are ambitious of this honor that cometh from God! how little of this is seen in our princes, and nobles, and great men! SCOTT.

These sentiments concerning the sovereignty and providence of God, the Giver of all wisdom and prosperity; his free and unfailing love to his people; the duty of kings; and the happiness of those nations who are favored with those that do their duty; together with her praising God for his love to his people, in which she cordially rejoiced, prove an understanding and pious mind. to our Lord Jesus, will find Him not only greater than Solomon, and wiser, but more kind; whatsoever we ask, it shall be done for us; nay, He will, out of his divine bounty, which infinitely exceeds royal bounty, even Solomon's, do for us more than we ask or think.

V. 14—29. We have here a further account of Solomon's prosperity:

I. How he increased his wealth. Though he had much, he still coveted to have more, being willing to try the utmost the things of this world could do, to make men happy. He received a great deal, in customs, from the merchants, and in land-taxes, from the countries his father had made tributaries to Israel, v. 15. He imported, once in three years, not only gold, silver, ivory, substantial goods, and serviceable, but apes to play with, and peacocks to please the eye with their feathers, v. 22. He had presents made him every year, from the neighboring princes and great men, not so much because they feared him, or were jealous of him, as because they loved him, and admired his wisdom, had often occasion to consult him, and sent him these presents by way of recompense for his advice in politics; and he took all that came, even garments and spices, horses and mules, v. 24, 25. He traded to Egypt for horses, and linen-yarn, (or, as some read it, linen-cloth,) the staple commodities of that country, and had his own merchants or factors in this traffic, who were accountable to him, v. 28, 29. The custom to be paid to the king of Egypt, for exported chariots and horses out of Egypt, was very high, but (so Patrick) Solomon, having married his daughter, got him to compound for the customs, so that he could bring them up cheaper than his neighbors, which obliged them to buy of him, which he was wise enough, no doubt, to make his advantage of. This puts an honor on trading, that Solomon, one of the greatest men that ever was, thought it no disparagement to him to trade. In all labor there is profit.

II. What use he made of his wealth. He did not hoard it up to look upon, and leave behind him. Of this he has, in his Ecclesiastes, so much exposed the folly, that we cannot suppose he should himself be guilty of it. No; God that had given him riches, and wealth, and honor, gave him also power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, Eccl. 5: 19.

1. He laid out his gold in fine things for himself, which he might the better be allowed to do, when he had, before, laid out so much in fine things for the house of God, (v. 16, 17.) not for service, but for state; he had shields and targets carried before him, to signify that he took pleasure in using his power for the defence and protection of the good, to whom he would be a praise. Magistrates are shields of the earth. He made a stately throne, on which he sat, to give laws to his subjects, audience to ambassadors, and judgment on appeals, v. 18—20. It was of ivory, or elephants' teeth, very rich; yet, as if he had so much gold he knew not what to do with it, he overlaid that with gold, the best. Yet, some think, he did not cover the ivory all over, but here and there. He rolled it, flowered it, or inlaid it, with gold. The stays, or arms, were supported by the images of lions in gold; so the steps by which he went up to it, to be a memorandum to him of that courage and resolution wherewith he ought to execute judgment, not fearing the face of man. The righteous, in that post, is bold as a lion. He made all his drinking-vessels, and all the furniture of his table, even at his country-seat, of pure gold, v. 21. He did not grudge himself what he had, but took the credit and comfort of it, such as it was. That is good, that does us good.

2. He made it circulate among his subjects, so that the kingdom was as rich as the king; he had no separate interests of his own to consult, but sought the welfare of his people. Those princes are not governed by Solomon's maxims, who think it policy to keep their subjects poor. Solomon was, herein, a type of Christ, who is not only rich Himself, but enriches all that are his Solomon was instrumental to bring so much gold into the country, and disperse it, that silver was nothing accounted of, v. 21. There was such plenty of it in Jerusalem, it was as the stones;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 6—13. There is a spiritual excellency in heavenly things, and in consistent Christians, to which no reports can do justice: and the better they are known, the more they will be esteemed and relished.—All our comforts and prospects spring from the Lord's love to us: He delights in the fruits of his own Spirit; and He communicates many good gifts to magistrates, ministers, and private Christians, out of love to his people, that they may be serviceable to them; and happy are they, who are governed and instructed by those, 'in whom the Lord delighteth.' This indeed has hitherto been a very uncommon case; and many are ready to conclude that it never can become general: but the Scriptures assure us, that at length it shall be the privilege and felicity of every nation under heaven.—The awakened sinner, oppressed with difficulties, objections, and fears, hears the report of the Savior's acts and wisdom, and riches and love; but can scarcely believe the report. With trouble, self-denial, and the forsaking of many earthly things, he resorts by faith and prayer to Him, and is graciously encouraged, and entertained: the Lord's effectual teaching dispels his darkness and distress; He shows him his glory and grace, satisfies him with the provisions of his house, and enriches him from his treasures of 'wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.' The rejoicing believer no longer glories in himself, and his own attainments: nor is he terrified, though humbled with the consciousness of his own guilt and pollution. The person, the character, the love, of Jesus attract and engross his admiring attention, while they confirm his lively hopes of salvation: and he finds, by experience, the half was not told him of his excellency and preciousness. He now congratulates the felicity of the meanest servant of the Redeemer, but especially that of those above, who always behold his face and do his will.—He blesses the Lord for his love to Israel, in giving them such a Prince and Savior, and yields up himself both to be ruled and saved by Him: and though Jesus needs not, and is not enriched by, all that he can render to Him; yet he devotes his riches and talents to his service, and they are graciously accepted, and recompensed with all that he can desire: yea, of his royal bounty, our Prince of Peace gives more than any petitioner 'asks or thinks.' The believer, who has thus been with Jesus, will return to his station in society, to discharge his duty, with new alacrity, from purer motives, and to nobler purposes Yet, he will still look forward to the day, when, being 'absent from the body, he shall be present with the Lord;' and when his transient glimpses of the Savior's glory, which overpower him with admiration, shall be exchanged for uninterrupted vision, with faculties enlarged, and strengthened to endure and delight in that ineffable refulgency. But who can express or conceive aright of that state of happiness? Oh, may the writer, and every reader of these observations, aspire after that unutterable felicity, and at length rejoice in it together! SCOTT.

Such is the nature of worldly wealth, plenty of it makes it the less valuable; much more should the enjoyment of spiritual riches lessen our esteem of all earthly possessions. If gold in abundance would make silver to seem so despicable, shall not wisdom, and grace, and the foretastes of heaven, which are far better than gold, make it seem much more so?

A throne is given below, taken from the tombs of the kings at Thebes, which exactly answers this description. There is a tradition (says Dr. A. Clarke, in another place) of the rabbins, particularly Jarchi, that 'Shishak invaded Israel in order to get the ivory throne of his son-in-law, Solomon, which he had always coveted, and this throne he carried away' into Egypt, when he plundered Jerusalem, and took away 'all the treasures of the king's house.' (1 K. 14:26.) Was this throne depicted in these tombs, (where appear several other thrones,) with the other trophies of victory, and who are the captives represented beneath the seat, and by whom added to the throne? A knowledge of the era of the builder of this tomb would settle the curious question, whether this is a painting of the throne of Solomon described in vs. 18, 19. The cushion is of a dark purple (leather of a Tyrian dye?) with very dark or black spots, the frame of the chair is pale blue, (of stained ivory?) inlaid with white (ivory?). The lions are yellow, (gold?) as are the supports of the feet, and the fancy-work on the legs. But it is probably only a picture of its model, and its existence possibly occasioned the Jewish tradition. It appears in the 'Harpers tomb,' of Bruce, &c. ('No 11' of Wilkinson. '5, to the E.' of Champ.) the 'catacomb of the harps' of the French commissioners. 'The monarch whose name here occurs, is Remeses III, (1285 B. C. [1561 Champ.]) but that of his father and predecessor is traced beneath the ovals of Remeses, who appropriated and completed the subjects on its walls. This catacomb is 405 ft. long, and has many chambers. Its descent is 31 ft.' See the description of its magnificence, in Wilkinson, and the great French work. Ed.

Many learned men have endeavored to show that Tharshish was a city in Spain, called Tartessus; and some think that this navy, which Solomon had with the navy of Hiram, was distinct from that which traded to Ophir, and was fitted out from some port on the Mediterranean: and they account for the length of time taken up in each voyage, by supposing that a great part of it was employed in selling and buying, or bartering, the several articles of commerce.—But, whatever gold might be, ivory, apes, and peacocks, (or parrots, as some render the word,) do not seem to have been articles of trade in any of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean.—'Jehoshaphat made ships of Tharshish to go to Ophir for gold: but they went not; for the ships were broken at Ezion-gaber.'—'He joined himself with Ahaziah to make ships to go to Tharshish, and they made the ships in Ezion-gaber. . . . And the ships were broken, that they were not able to go to Tharshish.' (22:48, 49. 2 Chr. 20: 35—37.) These passages being decisive proofs that the ships of Tharshish, ships to go to Tharshish, were built at Ezion-gaber on the Red Sea, the learned Bp. Lowth, (having adopted the opinion, that Tharshish was Tartessus in Spain,) says, 'Tharshish is celebrated in Scripture for the trade, which Solomon carried on thither in conjunction with the Tyrians. Jehoshaphat attempted afterward to renew that trade; and from the account given of that attempt, it appears, that this fleet was to sail from Ezion-gaber on the Red Sea, and must therefore have designed to sail round Africa, as Solomon's fleet probably had done before: for it was a three years' voyage; and they brought gold from Ophir, probably from the coast of Arabia, silver from Tartessus, and ivory, apes, and peacocks, from Africa.—It is certain, that under Pharaoh-necho, about 200 years after, this voyage was made by the Egyptians,' &c. Bp. Lowth on Is. 2:13—16.—But, with all deference to so eminent a writer, it must be allowed extremely improbable, that in regular voyages, for commerce, (not discovery, for which Pharaoh-necho's extraordinary expedition doubtless was undertaken,) such a circuitous course should be chosen; when, as far as we can learn, it was not then known that Africa was a peninsula! To fit out one navy at Ezion-gaber, for Ophir, whether in Arabia, or the East Indies, which might coast some parts of Africa; and to fit out another navy to Spain from some Mediterranean port, would be an obvious and compendious measure: but that the same ships should attempt the whole, and after taking in the far richest part of their freight, comparatively near home; should with it attempt to sail round Africa, in order to add silver, and some other articles of inferior value, at Tartessus, must strike every reflecting person as a most unparalleled proceeding.—To sail round Africa at that time, would be immensely more formidable, than a voyage round the world at present: and a single glance at a map must convince any person, acquainted with commerce, that no man of common prudence would ever think of such a voyage for lucrative purposes.—Tharshish seems indeed, in some places, to mean Tartessus, or Tarsus, or some place connected with the Mediterranean: for Jonah embarked for Tharshish at Joppa; and Joppa is situated on the Mediterranean. Ships of Tharshish seem also sometimes to mean any large ships fitted out for long voyages. But in this place, and some others referred to, if the text be not corrupted, (which there is not the least reason to suppose,) Tharshish must mean some place in the East Indies, or bordering on the Indian Ocean. (2 Chr. 9:13—21, v. 21.) Scott.

ness, as that which is the whole of man, and will do infinitely more toward the making of us easy and happy, than all the wealth and power he was master of; and which, through the grace of God, is within our reach, when the thousandth part of Solomon's greatness is a thousand times more than we can ever be so vain as to promise ourselves in this world.

CHAP. XI. This ch. begins with as melancholy a but as almost any in all the Bible. Hitherto, we have read nothing of Solomon, but what was great and good; but the lustre both of his goodness, and of his greatness, is here sullied and eclipsed, and his sun sets under a cloud.

V. 1—8. We have here a sad story, and very surprising, of Solomon's defection and degeneracy.

I. Let us inquire into the occasions and particulars of it.

1. He doted on strange women, many strange women. This his mother had particularly cautioned him against; (Prov. 31: 3.) Give not thy strength unto women; for it is that which, as much as any thing, destroys kings. His father David's fall began with the lusts of the flesh, which he should have taken warning by. The love of women has cast down many wounded, Prov. 7: 26. He took many women, 1000 in all, and not one good one among them, as he himself owns in his penitential sermon, (Eccl. 7: 28.) for no woman of established virtue would be one of such a set. God had, by his law, particularly forbidden the kings to multiply either horses or wives, Deut. 17: 16, 17. He broke the former law, in multiplying horses, and having them out of Egypt too, ch. 10: 29. here, he broke the latter. Note, Less sins, made bold with, open the door to greater. Perhaps he presumed it lawful, because David had multiplied his wives. Note, If those in reputation for religion, in any thing, set a bad example, they know not what mischief it may do, particularly to their own children. One bad act of a good man may be of more pernicious consequence to others, than twenty of a wicked man. Probably Solomon, at first, intended not to exceed his father's number. Divine wisdom has appointed one woman for one man: they who do not think one enough, will not think two or three enough; unbridled lust will be unbounded; the loosened hind will wander endlessly. But this was not all: They were strange women, v. 2. Some think he married them in policy, by them to get intelligence of the state of those countries. I rather fear it was because the daughters of Israel were too grave and modest for him, and these pleased him with their wantonness. Or, perhaps, it was for state, to have his seraglio, as his other treasures, replenished with what was far-fetched. To complete the mischief, Solomon clave unto these in love, v. 2. Solomon was master of a great deal of knowledge, but to what purpose, when he had no better government of his appetites?

2. He was drawn by them to the worship of strange gods. We have reason to think it impaired his health, and hastened on him the decays of age; his treasure, too, though vast, would be little enough to maintain the pride and vanity of all these women; perhaps it occasioned him, in his latter end, to neglect his business, by which he lost his supplies from abroad, and was forced to burden his subjects, to keep up his grandeur; ch. 12: 4. But none of these consequences were so bad as this, His wives turned away his heart after other gods, v. 3, 4. [Few things more unfit the mind for communion with God, than excess in such indulgence.] We cannot suppose he quite cast off the worship of God, much less that he restrained or hindered it; the temple-service went on as usual; but he grew less frequent and less

CHAP. XI.

Solomon, having taken very many wives and concubines, even strange women, is in his old age seduced by them into idolatry, 1—3. The Lord threatens to rend the greater part of the kingdom from his family, 9—13. Solomon finds an adversary in Hadad the Edomite, who had been entertained in Egypt, 14—22: and in Rezon, who reigned in Damascus, 23—25: and in Jeroboam, to whom Ahijah foretold that he should reign over ten tribes, and whom Solomon in vain attempts to kill, 26—40. Solomon dies and is buried, and Rehoboam succeeds him, 41—43.

BUT king Solomon [a] loved many strange women, ‖ together with the daughter of Pharaoh, women of the Moabites, Ammonites,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14—29. They have the most comfort in worldly things, (though seldom the largest share of them,) who expect least from them, and decidedly prefer wisdom and grace, and who devote the best of all which they have to the Lord: for his largest promises, general and particular, shall surely be performed to those who trust and serve Him. But alas! what are worldly wealth and prosperity? They can only procure luxuries, embellishments, and curiosities, which add nothing to the real enjoyment of life: abundance creates satiety, and what is had in plenty is nothing accounted of. Such possessions always multiply cares and temptations: and they generally undermine humility and heavenly-mindedness, and eat out the life of religion, by leading to sensual indulgence, avarice, ostentation, or the pride of life. But the spiritual peace, riches, and abundance of the Redeemer's kingdom, are of another nature: they satisfy, but never satiate; while they sanctify the soul, and strengthen it to resist temptation, and to mortify every fleshly lust. SCOTT.

Verses 24—27.

(3-5—14 4:26—34.) These particulars were recorded, to show the faithfulness of God, to the promises made to David and to Solomon, whose reign typified the kingdom of the Messiah, in its peace and prosperity, and in the submission and willing services of princes and nations.—But Solomon was doubtless culpable in several respects, and his mind was gradually corrupted from its simplicity to excessive luxury and ostentation, which prepared the way for the awful departure from God recorded in the ensuing ch. (2 Sam. 11:1—5.) SCOTT.

(27.) Sycamore.] 'A large evergreen tree, very common in Arabia, Palestine, and Egypt, especially in the low lands. Its wood is very durable, as the mummy chests of it, 3000 yrs. old, prove. Its fruit is like a fig, and eaten by the poor, and its leaves like the mulberry. Hence its name, syke, a fig, in Greek, and morea, a mulberry tree, called Sycamore in the SS.' See Harris. 'Its fruit springs from the trunk and not the branches, is destitute of seeds, very luscious, and is produced abundantly 7 times a year.' ED.

Verses 28, 29.

Solomon and Pharaoh seem to have traded together, by their merchants, to the exclusion of other persons. The price of the linen yarn, according to its quality, was fixed by contract. The price of a good chariot-horse also was fixed at about 19 pounds sterling, and that of a chariot at 75: and, in a contract, there is no absurdity in supposing that, the quality being described, a certain sum should be given for each, one with another. Besides those, which were brought for the king's use, numbers were sold again, at a great profit, doubtless, to the neighboring princes: for Pharaoh reserved to his son-in-law the exclusive advantage of this lucrative trade. Some indeed suppose the stipulated sums to have been an exorbitant tax, laid by Pharaoh on all chariots, or horses, which were exported: but the other seems the more probable way of explaining the passage. (M. R. t, u. Deut. 17: 16. Is. 31:1—3.) SCOTT.

(28.) Linen yarn.] 'Miqveh: a word hard to be understood, if it be not a corruption. Vulg. and Sept. "from Coa or Tekoa." Some, as Bochart, (and most probably,) understand tribute: others the string by which the head of one horse was tied to the tail of the other, and so transl. droves. Jarchi makes it a collection of horses, or a "stud." Houbigant would read merchubah, chariots, but no versions nor mss. acknowledge this reading.' Dr. A. CLARKE. Many commentators make it the name of a place. The Heb. reminds us of the 'Kufa;' note, v. 22, 25. ED.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—8. Probably, Solomon's declension was gradual; he was perhaps elated with spiritual pride, as well as induced by his prosperity to indulge in luxury and ostentation: or, perhaps, he deemed it unnecessary for one of his wisdom and ability, and of his rank and authority, to restrict himself by those rules, which were needful or salutary to inferior persons, as if he were secure from those evils which they were intended to prevent!—Thus he proceeded, till perhaps persons were employed to collect from every part of his king-

Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites:

2 Of the nations concerning which the LORD said unto the children of Israel, [b] Ye shall not go in to them, neither shall they come in unto you: for [c] surely they will turn away your heart after their gods: [d] Solomon clave unto these in love.

3 And he had [e] seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines: and his wives turned away his heart.

4 For it came to pass, [f] when Solomon was old, that [g] his wives turned away his heart after other gods: and [h] his heart was not perfect with the LORD his God, as was the heart of David his father.

5 For Solomon went after [i] Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians, and after [k] Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites.

6 And Solomon did evil in the sight of the LORD, and [*] went not fully after the LORD, as did David his father.

7 Then did Solomon build an high place for [m] Chemosh, the [n] abomination of Moab, in [o] the hill that is before Jerusalem, and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon.

8 And likewise did he for [p] all his strange wives, which burnt incense and sacrificed unto their gods.

[Practical Observations.]

9 ¶ And the LORD was [q] angry with Solomon, because [r] his heart serious, in his ascent to the house of the Lord, and his attendance on his altar; he left his first love, lost his zeal for God, and did not persevere as he had begun; therefore it is said, he was not perfect, because he was not constant; and he followed not God fully, because he turned from following Him, and did not continue to the end.

He tolerated and maintained his wives in their idolatry, and made no scruple of joining them in it. Pharaoh's daughter was proselyted (as is supposed), but he used no means to convert his other wives; in complaisance to them, he built chapels for their gods, (v. 7, 8.) maintained their priests, and occasionally attended their altars; making a jest of it, as if it were no harm, but all religions were alike; which (says Patrick) has been the disease of some great wits; when he humored one thus, the rest would take it ill, if he did not, in like manner, gratify them, so he did it for all his wives, (v. 8.) and, at last, set up a high place for Chemosh in the hill before Jerusalem, the mount of Olives, as if to confront the temple he himself had built; these high places continued here, not utterly demolished, till Josiah did it, 2 K. 23: 13.

II. Let us now pause a while, and lament Solomon's fall; and we may justly stand and wonder at it. Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid, as the prophet exclaims in a like case, Jer. 2: 12. Solomon, in his old age, insnared with fleshly lusts, youthful lusts; let us never presume on the strength of our resolutions, or the weakness of our corruptions, so as to be off our guard. So wise a man as Solomon was, so famed for a quick understanding and sound judgment, made such a fool of by these foolish women: one who had so often and so plainly warned others of the danger of the love of women, himself so wretchedly bewitched with it; it is easier to see a mischief, and to show it others, than to shun it ourselves. So good a man, so zealous for the worship of God, who had been conversant with divine things, and who prayed that excellent prayer at the dedication of the temple, doing these sinful things—is this Solomon? Are all his wisdom and devotion come to this, at last?

What shall we say to this? Why God permitted it, it is not for us to inquire; He knew how to bring glory to Himself out of it. God foresaw it, when He said of him that should build the temple, If he commit iniquity, &c. 2 Sam. 7: 14. But it concerns us to inquire what good use we may make of it. Let him that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall; we see how weak we are of ourselves, without the grace of God; let us therefore live in a constant dependence on that grace. See the danger of a prosperous condition, and how hard it is to overcome the temptations of it; the food convenient Agur prayed for, is safer and better than the food abundant, Solomon was even surfeited with. See what need those have to stand on their guard, who have made a great profession of religion, and showed themselves forward and zealous in devotion, because the devil will set on them most violently, and if they misbehave, the reproach is the greater: it is the evening that commends the day; let us therefore fear, lest, having run well, we seem to come short.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. Men of superior understanding find it far easier to lay down excellent rules for the conduct of others, than to reduce them to practice in the constant tenor of their own lives. (Prov. 1:—9:) For alas! they often fall into the same pit, and are caught in the same snare, against which they have repeatedly warned others; and sometimes are guilty of things as absurd and foolish as they are wicked. Nay, old age itself will not eradicate from the heart any evil propensity. The habit of indulgence in fleshly lusts will more than counterbalance the effect of nature's decay: and if our sinful passions be not crucified and mortified by the grace of God, they will subsist and rage when every opportunity of gratification shall be taken away.—Thus we are taught to 'cease from man,' and to watch and be sober: for ours is a dangerous warfare in an enemy's country, while the worst of our foes are the traitors which occupy our own hearts.—We all naturally desire prosperity and pre-eminence; yet in general these operate as fatal poisons to the soul. And when we allow of one inordinate or inexpedient indulgence, we give energy to all our passions, and to every temptation of Satan. Our safety and comfort therefore consist in resolutely requiring them all to obey, and, though we cannot extinguish our passions, in rigorously confining them within the bounds of what is lawful and expedient.—The love of women is one of the most dangerous passions of the human heart. When once the divine, original appointment concerning marriage is violated, the unbridled propensity will know no bounds: nor can the wisest or the most determined say to it, 'Thus far shalt thou go, and no further:' but, like a descending weight, the progress is from bad to worse with accelerated rapidity; till shame and conscience are surmounted, reputation and interest sacrificed, every barrier is broken down, and a perfect infatuation takes place. (P. O. Judg. 16:)—Those who have made the boldest profession of godliness, and have been most serviceable to its interests, should be peculiarly watchful against the incursions of spiritual pride; or the fatal persuasion, that they are superior to those rules and cautions, which are needful for weaker persons. They should always meditate with seriousness on their danger of falling, and the wide-spreading, fatal effects of their misconduct; and prefer any affliction, or even death, to thus dishonoring God and his truth.—The fond hope, which numbers indulge, who marry with ungodly persons, of being instrumental to their salvation, stands exposed throughout the Scripture, but especially in this chapter. Considering the state of human nature, the case is as desperate, as that of a healthy person associating with those that have got the plague, who is far more likely to be infected himself, than to recover them: and the Lord's prohibition of such marriages declares them to be means, which He does not allow.

dom, but especially from the subjected nations, every beautiful woman whom they found, without regard to her religion. Those of superior rank seem to have been numbered among his wives, and styled princesses; while the inferiors were his concubines, with inferior privileges. (Note, Gen. 25:5, 6.)—Those who have noted in history, or in society, the effects of the influence of inveigling women over the greatest and wisest of men, will readily perceive that matters were speedily in a train; and that it was almost impossible, without an immediate divine interposition, that Solomon should stop short of this extreme folly and wickedness, when he had once suffered himself to be entangled in the fatal net. (Judg. 16:4—21.) The inspired historian, therefore, quotes the prohibition of marrying strange women, with the annexed consequence, 'Surely they will turn away your heart after their gods:' to show that no eminency of wisdom, or firmness of resolution, will secure any man, when, in a careless or self-confident spirit, he presumes to violate God's commandments, and thus to run into temptation. Of this, Solomon formed a most striking proof. (M. R. b. c.—Ex. 34:11—17. Josh. 23:11—13. Neh. 13:23—30.) (M. R. h.) SCOTT.

(3.) 'Darius Codomanus was accustomed to take, in his camp, no fewer than 300 wives, and Le Compte tells us, that the emperor of China had a vast number, chosen for their beauty, many of whom the emperor never so much as saw.' BOOTHROYD was turned from the LORD God of Israel, [a] which had appeared unto him twice,

10 And had [b] commanded him concerning this thing, that he should not go after other gods: but he kept not that which the LORD commanded.

11 Wherefore the LORD said unto Solomon, Forasmuch as this [*] is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, [c] I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant.

12 Notwithstanding [v] in thy days I will not do it [x] for David thy father's sake: but [y] I will rend it out of the hand of thy son.

13 Howbeit [z] I will not rend away all the kingdom; but will give [a] one tribe to thy son [b] for David my servant's sake, and [c] for Jerusalem's sake which I have chosen.

14 ¶ And [d] the LORD stirred up [e] an adversary unto Solomon, Hadad the Edomite: he was of the king's seed in Edom.

B. C. 1040. 15 For it came to pass, [f] when David was in Edom, and Joab the captain of the host was gone up to bury the slain, [g] after he had smitten [h] every male in Edom;

16 (For six months did Joab remain there with all Israel, until he had cut off every male in Edom;)

17 That Hadad fled, he and certain Edomites of his father's servants with him, to go into Egypt; [i] Hadad being yet a little child.

18 And they arose out of [k] Midian, and came to [l] Paran; and they took men with them out of Paran, and they came to Egypt, unto Pharaoh king of Egypt; which gave him an house, and appointed him victuals, and gave him land.

19 And Hadad [m] found great favor in the sight of Pharaoh, so that he gave him to wife the loved Solomon, (2 Sam. 12: 24.) and delighted in him; (ch. 10: 9.) but now the Lord was angry with him, (v. 9.) for there was in his sin, 1. The most base ingratitude; the Lord had appeared unto him twice, once, before he began to build the temple, (ch. 3. 5.) and once, after he had dedicated it, ch. 9: 2. God keeps account of his gracious visits, whether we do or no; and will remember it against us, if we turn from Him. 2. The most wilful disobedience: this very thing God had commanded him—not to go after other gods, yet he was not kept right by such an express admonition, v. 10. Those who have dominion over men, are apt to forget God's dominion over them; and, while they demand obedience from their inferiors, to deny it to the Supreme.

II. The message He sent him hereupon, v. 11. it is likely, by a prophet. The sentence is just, that since he had revolted from God, part of his kingdom should revolt from his family. This was a great mortification to Solomon; but sin ruins families, cuts off entails, alienates estates, and lays men's honor in the dust. Yet the mitigations are very kind, for David's sake; (v. 12, 13.) i. e. for the sake of the promise to David; thus, all the favor God shows to man, is for Christ's sake, and for the sake of the covenant with Him. The kingdom shall be rent from Solomon's house, but, 1. Not immediately; Solomon shall not live to see it done; but what comfort can a man take in leaving children and an estate, if he do not leave a blessing, behind him? Yet if judgments be coming, it is a favor to us, if they come not in our days, as 2 K. 20: 19. 2. Not wholly; one tribe, Judah, the strongest and most numerous, shall remain, (v. 13.) for Jerusalem's sake, which David built, and for the sake of the temple there, which Solomon built, these shall not go into other hands.

Upon this message, we have reason to hope he repented, and as the fruit of it, published the book of Ecclesiastes, where he bitterly laments his own folly and madness; (ch. 7: 25, 26.) and warns others to take heed of the like evil courses, 12: 13, 14. That penitential sermon was as true an indication of a heart broken for sin; and turned from it, as David's penitential psalms, though of another nature. God's grace in his people works variously. God may suffer those whom He loves to fall into sin, yet He will not suffer them to lie still in it. Solomon's defection, though much his reproach, and a great blemish to his character, yet did not so far break in on the character of his reign, but that it was afterward made the pattern of a good reign, 2 Chr. 11: 17.

V. 14—25. Here we have an account of two adversaries, inconsiderable, and that could not have done any thing worth noticing, had not Solomon first made God his Enemy. If God be on our side, we need not fear the greatest adversary; but if He be against us, He can make us fear the least, and the very grasshopper shall be a burden.

They themselves were moved by principles of ambition or revenge, but God made use of them, v. 14, 23. to serve his design of correcting Solomon; he himself was made to feel the smart of the rod, for his greater humiliation. Note, Whoever are, any way, adversaries to us, we must notice the hand of God in it; look through the instruments to the Author, and hear the Lord's controversy in it.

1. Hadad, an Edomite; we are not told what he did, only, in general, that he was an adversary: but we are told, that what induced him to bear Solomon a grudge was, David had conquered Edom, v. 15, 16. 2 Sam. 8: 14. And, what enabled him to do Solomon a mischief, was, his return to his own country again, on the death of David and Joab. It should seem, he remained quiet, while Solomon continued wise and watchful, but when Solomon, having sinned away his wisdom, as Samson his strength, grew careless of public affairs, was off his guard himself, and had forfeited the divine protection, then he troubled him. We are here told only how loath Pharaoh

She was the type of moral and physical force, presided over wisdom, philosophy, and war. The vulture was consecrated to her, as the mother goddess. Her hieroglyphical title is, tmoe nib mptpe (mother, lady, of the upper region.) The monuments represent conquering kings offering their captives to her, as goddess of war. Cruden gives the meaning of the word Tahpenes, a 'standard, flight, temptation, secret;' The head of a goddess, who bears a vulture's beak, cow's horns, and a moon, is given as a 'standard' in the cut, Ps. 20: 5; The flight of the vulture is remarkable; 'temptation' and woman have much in com mon; the 'moon' presides over the 'secrets' of darkness, and the vul ture's eye searches hidden things afar off. From all which we may conjecture, that this queen of Egypt bore the names of two goddesses, as head and mother of Egypt, or of Neith the mother; while her husband bore the name of Amon-re, the sun, ruler, head and father of sister of his own wife, the sister of [n] Tahpenes the queen.

20 And the sister of Tahpenes bare him Genubath his son, whom Tahpenes [o] weaned in Pharaoh's house: and Genubath was in Pharaoh's household among the sons of Pharaoh.

B. C. 1015.] 21 And when Hadad [p] heard in Egypt that David slept with his fathers, and that Joab the captain of the host was dead, Hadad said to Pharaoh, * Let me depart, that I may go to mine own country.

22 Then Pharaoh said unto him, [q] But what hast thou lacked with me, that, behold thou seekest to go to thine own country? And he answered, † Nothing: howbeit [r] let me go in any wise.

23 ¶ And [s] God stirred him up another adversary, Rezon the son of Eliadah, which fled from his lord [t] Hadadezer king of Zobah:

24 And he gathered men unto him, and became captain over a band, when David slew them of Zobah; and they went to [u] Damascus, and dwelt therein, and reigned in Damascus.

25 And he was an adversary to Israel [x] all the days of Solomon, beside the mischief that Hadad did: and he [y] abhorred Israel, and reigned over Syria.

26 ¶ And [z] Jeroboam the son of Nebat, [a] an Ephrathite of Zereda, [b] Solomon's servant, whose mother's name was Zeruah, a widow-woman, even he lifted up his hand against the king.

27 And this was the cause that he [c] lifted up his hand against the king: [d] Solomon built Millo, and ‡ repaired [e] the breaches of [f] the city of David his father.

28 And the man Jeroboam was a mighty man of valor: and Solomon seeing the young man that he § was industrious, [g] he made him ruler over all the ‖ charge of [h] the house of Joseph.

29 And it came to pass at that time when Jeroboam went out of Jerusalem, that the prophet [i] Ahijah the [k] Shilonite found him in the way: and he had clad himself with a new garment; [l] and they two were alone in the field:

was to part with him, and how earnestly he solicited his stay, v. 22. Peter Martyr has a pious reflection on Hadad's answer; 'That heaven is our home, to which we ought to keep up a holy affection and desire, even then when the world, the place of our banishment, smiles most upon us.' Does it ask, What have you lacked, that you are so willing to be gone? We may answer, 'Nothing that the world can do for us; but however, let us go thither, where our hope, and honor, and treasure, are.'

2. Rezon, a Syrian, was another adversary; he, when David conquered the Syrians, headed the remains, lived at large by spoil and rapine, till Solomon grew careless, and then he got possession of Damascus, reigned there, (v. 24.) and over the country about; (v. 25.) and he created troubles to Israel, probably in conjunction with Hadad, all the days of Solomon, namely, after his apostasy; or he was an enemy to Israel, during all Solomon's reign, and on all occasions vented his then impotent malice against them; but till Solomon's revolt, when his defence was departed from him, he could not do them any mischief.

V. 26—40. We have, here, the first mention made of that infamous name, Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, that made Israel to sin; he is here brought on the stage as an adversary to Solomon, and the man to whom God had expressly told him (v. 11.) He would give the greatest part of his kingdom. We have here an account,

I. Of his extraction; (v. 26.) he was of Ephraim, next in honor to Judah; his mother a widow, to whom Providence had made up the loss of a husband in a son active and ingenious, and (we may suppose) a great support and comfort to her.

II. Of his elevation. It was Solomon's wisdom to employ proper persons to do his business; he observed Jeroboam to be industrious, therefore he gradually advanced him, till, at length, he made him receiver-general for Ephraim and Manasseh, or ruler of the burden, or tribute, i. e. either of the taxes, or of the militia, of the house of Joseph. Industry is the way to preferment.

III. Of his designation to the government of the ten tribes, after the death of Solomon. Some think he was himself plotting against Solomon, and contriving to rise to the throne; indeed, it is plainly intimated he had it in his thoughts, for the prophet tells him, as he was going to take possession of his government, (v. 37.) Thou shalt reign according to all that thy soul desireth; which imboldened him to aim high, and, in some instances, to oppose the king, and give him vexation.

The prophet was Ahijah of Shiloh; we shall read of him again, ch. 14: 2. The sign, by which it was represented to him, was, the rending of a garment, Ahijah's probably, into twelve pieces, and giving him ten, v. 30; he (i. e. the prophet) clad himself with a new garment, on purpose. The rending the kingdom from Saul was signified by rending Samuel's mantle, not Saul's, 1 Sam. 15: 27, 28. It was more significant, to give Jeroboam ten pieces of what was not his own before, than of what was; the prophets, both true and false, used such signs, even in the N. T. as Agabus, Acts 21: 11.

The message is very particular.

1. He assures him he should be king over ten of the twelve tribes, v. 31. not for his good character or deserts, but to chastise Solomon's apostasy, v. 33. not because he was likely to do much better; thus Israel must know, that it is not for their righteousness they are made masters of Canaan, but for the wickedness of the Canaanites, Deut. 9: 4. Jeroboam did not deserve so good a post, but Israel deserved so bad a prince. He thus warns him to take heed of sinning away his preferment, in like manner.

2. He limits his expectations to the ten tribes only, and to them, in reversion, after the death of Solomon. He must not think David was rejected, as Saul was; no, God would not take his loving-kindness from him, as from Saul. The house of Egypt: cuts, 14:25. 2 K. 17:4, &c. So that the wife of this Pharaoh appears to have been an idolatress, whether the daughter of Pharaoh whom Solomon married, (a much debated question,) was so or not. These remarks are indulged, in the hope of exciting greater interest in Egyptian literature, from which so much to corroborate the Scriptures, it is to be hoped, will be drawn. Comp. note 12:26—29. Damascus.] 'Called also Damesk, but generally El Sham, (the sun,) by the Arabs, is in a delightful plain [amid extensive gardens, forming a circuit of 25 or 30 miles], well watered by the Barrada, at the E. foot of Anti-Libanus, being surrounded by hills in the form of a triumphal arch, 136 miles N. of Jerusalem, 195 S. of Antioch, and 276 S. S. W. of Diarbekir. It is a city of the highest antiquity, being at least as old as Abraham's time; it has often been captured, and several times demolished, but has always risen to splendor and dignity. [It has well paved streets, with side-walks, and above 500 large and magnificent houses entitled to the name of palaces: each house has a canal or fountain. Mosques and chapels are numerous, and the grand mosque is of great extent and magnificence. There is a Greek, Syrian, Maronite, and Armenian church, and 8 synagogues of Jews. Maundrell describes the modern town as long, straight, from N. E. to S. W. slender in the middle, but bigger at each end, especially the N. E. Niebuhr makes the walls something less than a league and a half in circumference; and the pop. is estimated at from 100,000 to 150,000.' A late traveller, Lamartine, says of it in 1833, 'in coming towards the city we ascended a few hundred paces to a deep defile, our Arabs suddenly stopped short, and uttering exclamations of joy, pointed to an opening in the rock on our right; I approached, and looking through the cleft I beheld the grandest and most singular prospect that ever presented itself to the eye of man. It was Damascus and its boundless desert, lying at the depth of a few hundred feet below us. The city, surrounded by its ramparts of black and yellow marble, flanked by its innumerable square towers, crowned by sculptured cranies, commanded by its forests of minarets of every form, and intersected by the seven branches of its river and its numberless streams, extended as far as the eye could reach. It was a labyrinth of gardens and flowers, thrusting its suburbs here and there in the vast plain, encircled by its forest of ten leagues in circumference, and every where shaded by groves of sycamores, and trees of every form and hue.' Pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1832—3. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9—43. The Lord is angry even with the objects of his special love, when their hearts are for a season, or in a measure, turned from Him; and the tokens of his favor, his answers to their prayers, and their comfortable communion with Him in times past, aggravate their guilt and increase his displeasure: nor can there be any peace, or assurance of acceptance, without unreserved, persevering obedience to his commandments. Yet, in punishing transgressors, He will not dishonor his own promises, desert the cause of true religion, or fail to honor the memories of those who have uprightly walked in his ways: and for the sake of Jesus, and his people, whom He hath chosen, He will not suffer his whole displeasure to arise. But when the Lord is become an Adversary, He will give power, courage, and capacity to other adversaries, and thus render those formidable, who before appeared contemptible. Unnecessary severity excites resentments, which may long after create us or ours disturbance and grief.—Many abhor the Israel of God, who are not permitted to hurt them: nay, when they seem to succeed in their malice, they are only the instruments of salutary chastisement to them. We often find our worst enemies among those, whom we have most befriended; especially when ingenuity, industry, and resolution, rather than piety, have recommended them to our notice.—Providential dispensations to this day, as well as prophetic declarations of old, try men's spirits, whether they will grasp at advantages at all events; or wait patiently, and use only lawful means of obtaining them, according to the will of God.—Many so believe some parts of God's Word, as perversely to take encouragement from them to commit iniquity; instead of so believing the whole, as to expect the blessings proposed in the way of conscientious obedience there prescribed. They are shown, and seem to understand, that others have forfeited their most valuable interests by sin; and yet they will seek to seize or to secure their own by similar transgressions! so inconsistent is human nature!—The Lord will not afflict for ever the people of his covenant: but when they grievously offend, He will eclipse their honor; will leave obscurity and reproach on their characters; and perhaps bring them down to the grave in disgrace, discomfort, and uncertainty; distressed concerning the state of their own souls, and about the consequences of their conduct, to their families, to the church, and to the world. May God help us to walk circumspectly; to pass the time of our sojourning here in fear; and to stand with our loins girded, and our lamps burning, prepared for and expecting the coming of our Lord! SCOTT.

Verses 29—32.

(M. R.—Note, Acts 21:7—14.) The meaning of the emblematical action, here recorded, seems to imply, that 'the new garment' belonged to the prophet, not to Jeroboam; though many expositors suppose the contrary.—Some think, that the rending of the garment into twelve pieces, represented also the subsequent divisions and distractions which prevailed in Israel. SCOTT.

Verse 40.

There is nothing in the original for therefore; it is simply 'And Solomon sought to kill Jeroboam.' It does not appear that he did this because of Ahijah's prophecy, which would have been an instance of most infatuated rebellion against God, and utterly inconsistent with repentance; but because of Jeroboam's subsequent misconduct, who perhaps divulged and boasted of the promise, and 'lifted up his hand against Solomon;' which implies an attempt to raise rebellion in his life-time. (26)—It is probable Shishak was the successor of Pharaoh, whose daughter Solomon had married: but perhaps of another family and interest. He is the only king of Egypt hitherto called by his proper name; all before him being known by the general title of Pharaoh. He is also thought to have been the Sesostris of pagan history: ['but,' says Dr. A. Clarke, 'it is likely he lived long before Solomon:'] and see Notes, 14:25—28. 2 Chr. 12:2—11.) SCOTT.

CHAP. XII.

The Israelites, assembled at Shechem to make Rehoboam king, with Jeroboam now returned from Egypt, demand redress of their grievances, 1—5. Rehoboam, rejecting the counsel of the old men, and following that of the young, answers them roughly, 6—15. Ten tribes revolt, stone Adoram, and make Jeroboam king, 16—20. Rehoboam raises an army to subdue them; but is forbidden by the prophet Shemaiah, 21—24. Jeroboam builds Shechem and Penuel, 25: and to establish his kingdom, he sets up the worship of the golden calves in Bethel and Dan, 26—33.

AND [a] Rehoboam went to [b] Shechem: for all Israel were come to Shechem to make him king.

2 And it came to pass, when [c] Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who was yet in Egypt, heard of it, (for he was fled from the presence of king Solomon, and Jeroboam dwelt in Egypt;)

3 That they sent and called him: and Jeroboam and all the congregation of Israel came, and spake unto Rehoboam, saying,

4 Thy father made [d] our yoke grievous: now therefore make thou the grievous service of thy father, and his heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee.

5 And he said unto them, Depart yet for three days: then come again to me. And the people departed.

6 And king Rehoboam [e] consulted with the old men that stood before Solomon his father, while he yet lived, and said, How do ye advise that I may answer this people?

7 And they spake ishly seeks to kill his successor. Had not he taught others, that whatever devices are in men's hearts, the counsel of the Lord that shall stand? And yet does he himself think to defeat that counsel? God's promise would have secured Jeroboam any where, yet he would use means, and was content to live in exile and obscurity for a while, being sure of a kingdom at last. And shall not we be so, who have a better kingdom in reserve?

V. 41—43. We have here the conclusion of Solomon's story, and in it, 1. Reference is had to another history then extant, but (not being divinely inspired) since lost, the book of the Acts of Solomon, v. 41. written, probably, by a chronologer or historiographer, whom he employed to write his annals, out of which the sacred writer extracted what God saw fit to transmit to the church. 2. His reign was as long as his father's, but not his life. Sin shortened his days. 3. His death, burial, and successor, v. 43. Thus the graves are filling with the generations that go off, and houses are filling with those that are growing up. As the grave cries, 'Give, give,' so land is never lost for want of an heir.

CHAP. XII. The glory of the kingdom of Israel was in its height and perfection, in Solomon; it was long in coming to it, but it soon declined, and began to sink and wither in the very next reign, as we find in this ch. where we have the kingdom divided, and thereby weakened, and made little, in comparison with what it had been. Thus did Judah become weak, being deserted by their brethren; and Israel, by deserting the house of the Lord.

V. 1—15. Solomon had 1000 wives and concubines, yet but one son to bear up his name, and he a fool. It is said, (Hos. 4: 10.) They shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase. Sin is a bad way of building up a family. Neither wisdom nor grace runs in the blood. Solomon came to the crown very young, yet he was then a wise man: Rehoboam at forty, when men will be wise, if ever, yet he was then foolish. Wisdom does not go by age, nor is it the multitude of years, or the advantage of education, even at Solomon's court, that teaches it. No dispute is made of Rehoboam's succession; on the death of his father, he was immediately proclaimed. But,

I. The people desire a treaty with him at Shechem, and he condescends to meet them there. 1. Their pretence was, to make him king, but their design, to unmake him. 2. The place was ominous; Abimelech set up at Shechem, Judg. 9. Yet it had been famous for the convention of the states there, Josh. 24: 1.

II. The representatives of the tribes address him, praying to be eased of the taxes they were burdened with. 1. They complain, (v. 4.) not of his father's idolatry, and revolt from God; the greatest grievance of all, was none to them; so careless and indifferent were they in matters of religion, as if God or Moloch were all one, so they might but live at ease, and pay no taxes. Yet their complaint was groundless and unjust. Never did people live more at ease than they, or in greater plenty. Were the taxes a burden? How could that be, when Solomon imported bullion in such plenty, that silver was, in a manner, as common as the stones? So that they did but render to Solomon the things that were Solomon's. Nay, suppose there was some hardship put upon them, were they not told before that this would be the manner of the king, and yet they would have one. The best government cannot secure itself from reproach and censure, no not Solomon's. Factious spirits will never want something to complain of I know nothing in Solomon's administration, that could make the people's yoke grievous, unless, perhaps, the women, whom in his latter days he doted on, where connived at in oppressing them. 2. They demand relief, and, on that condition, will continue in their allegiance. All their care was, to save their money, whether their religion was supported, and the government protected, or no. All seek their own.

III. Rehoboam consulted with those about him, concerning the answer he should give to this address, as was prudent, especially he having so weak a head of his own; yet, on this occasion, it was impolitic to take time himself to consider, for thereby he gave time to the disaffected to ripen things for a revolt; and his deliberating in so plain a case would be improved as an indication of the little concern he had for the people's ease. They saw what they must expect, and prepared accordingly. The way to rule, is to serve; to do good, and to stoop to do it; to become all things to all men, and so win their hearts. Those in power, really sit highest, and easiest, and safest, that do so.

It was an instance of Rehoboam's weakness, that he did not prefer aged counsellors, but the young men that had grown up with him, and with whom he was familiar, v. 8. Days should speak. Great wits have not always the most wisdom; nor are those to be relied on as our best friends, that know how to make us merry, for that will not make us happy. It is of great consequence to young people setting out in the world, to have suitable associates. If they reckon those that feed their pride, gratify their vanity, and further them in their pleasures, their best friends, they are already marked for ruin. They thought the old men expressed themselves but dully, v. 7. They affect to be witty in their advice. The old men did not undertake to put words into Rehoboam's mouth, only counselled him to speak good words: but the young men will furnish him with very pointed and pert similitudes; My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins, &c. That is not always the best sense that is best worded.

IV. He answered the people, according to the counsel of the young men, v. 14, 15. He affected to be haughty and imperious, and fancied he could carry all before him with a high hand, therefore would rather run the risk of losing them, than deny himself so far as to give them good words. Note, Many ruin themselves by consulting their humor more than their interest.

1. Rehoboam could not have acted more foolishly and impolitely. (1.) He owned their reflections on his father's government to be true, v. 14. and therein was unjust to his father's memory which he might easily have vindicated from the imputation. (2.) He fancied himself better able

Solomon did not repent, than the silence of the book of Chronicles proves that he did not commit idolatry. I would not indeed decide on so controverted a point with unhesitating confidence: yet the book of Ecclesiastes seems fully to show, that he repented, and publicly declared that repentance before his death. (Ec. 7:23—28.) We are not however [so] much interested in the solution, as some suppose: for the doctrines of Christianity must be proved by 'the sure testimony of God,' and not by particular examples: for we are not sufficiently acquainted, either with the real character of men, or with their final doom, to decide on this ground. If Solomon did not repent, he doubtless perished, notwithstanding all his previous zeal, important services, and eminent endowments: for no part of Scripture gives reason to suppose, that any who die in unrepented wickedness are saved. Many indeed think that this supposition would prove all his profession of religion to have been hypocritical; and this conclusion does not well accord to his name Jedidiah, and the testimony of the Holy Spirit, that he 'loved the LORD.' NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. That Solomon should have no more children, may be considered as a providential rebuke, for his multiplying wives in so unprecedented a manner.—Solomon seems to have been sensible, that his son was not likely to prove a wise man, or to carry on his designs for the good of Israel, and the establishment of his family; and he appears to have greatly regretted it. (Ec. 2:18—23.) Shechem. (M. R. b.) It is probable this city, which belonged to Ephraim, was chosen, rather than Jerusalem or Hebron, that the tribe of Judah might not have too great influence in the transaction; and Rehoboam was impolitic in consenting to that appointment, if he could have prevented it. SCOTT.

When the scriptural account of Solomon's reign, and the peace, affluence, and prosperity which Israel then enjoyed, are considered, we cannot doubt, but that this charge was either false or greatly exaggerated. (9.19. 11:1—8.) ID.

Grievous service.] 'We are told in a previous ch. (9:19—22.) that Solomon's immense buildings were reared by his Canaanites and other bond slaves: it should seem, however, as his works increased, that he did not entirely confine himself to them: but the "grievous yoke" may refer chiefly to the heavy taxes imposed to defray the expense of building his own palaces, [&c.] as well as the temple, and to repay king Hiram for the timber and gold he had sent; which last he seems to have lavished with great profusion. What is gained without labor is often expended without care.' WILLIAMS.

unto him, saying, [f]If thou wilt be a servant unto this people this day, and wilt serve them, and answer them, and [g]speak good words to them, then they will be thy servants for ever.

8 But [h]he forsook the counsel of the old men, which they had given him, and consulted with the young men that were grown up with him, and which stood before him:

9 And he said unto them, [i]What counsel give ye, that we may answer this people who have spoken to me, saying, Make the yoke which thy father did put upon us lighter?

10 And the young men that were grown up with him, spake unto him, saying, [k]Thus shalt thou speak unto this people that spake unto thee, saying, Thy father made our yoke heavy, but make thou it lighter unto us; thus shalt thou say unto them, [l]My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins.

11 And now, whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, [m]I will add to your yoke: my father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with [n]scorpions.

12 So Jeroboam and all the people came to Rehoboam the third day, as the king had appointed, saying [o]Come to me again the third day.

13 And the king [p]answered the people [*]roughly, and forsook the old men's counsel that they gave him;

14 And spake to them after [q]the counsel of the young men, saying, [r]My father made your yoke heavy, and I will add to your yoke: my father also chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.

15 Wherefore the king hearkened not unto the people; for [s]the cause was from the LORD, [t]that he might perform his saying, which the LORD spake by Ahijah the Shilonite unto Jeroboam the son of Nebat.

16 So when all Israel saw that the king hearkened not unto them, the people answered the king, saying, [u]What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: [v]to your tents, O Israel: [x]now see to thine own house, David. [y]So Israel departed unto their tents.

17 But as for [z]the children of Israel which dwelt in the cities of Judah, Rehoboam reigned over them.

18 Then king Rehoboam sent [a]Adoram, who was over the tribute; and [b]all Israel stoned him with stones, that he died. Therefore king Rehoboam [†]made speed to get him up to his chariot, to [c]flee to Jerusalem.

19 So [d]Israel [‡]rebelled against the house of David [e]unto this day.

They speak here very unbecomingly of David, calling him the son of Jesse, no greater than his neighbors, [a phraseology of contempt still common in the east.] How soon are good men, and their good services to the public, forgotten! The rashness of their resolution was also much to be blamed; in time, and with prudent management, they might have settled the original contract with Rehoboam, to mutual satisfaction: otherwise, it is true, their jealousy for their liberty and property well became that free people. Israel is not a servant, is not a home-born slave; why should he be spoiled? Jer. 2: 14. They are willing to be ruled, but not to be ridden; protection draws allegiance, but destruction cannot. No marvel Israel falls away from the house of David, (v. 19.) if the house of David fall away from the great end of their advancement, which was, to be ministers of God to them for good. But thus to rebel against the seed of David, whom God had advanced to the kingdom, (entailing it on his seed,) and to set up another king in opposition to that family, was a great sin; see 2 Chr. 13: 5—8. To this God refers, Hos. 8: 4. They have set up kings, but not by Me. And it is here mentioned, to the praise of the tribe of Judah, that they followed the house of David, (v. 17, 20.) and, for aught that appears, they found Rehoboam better than his word, nor did he rule with the rigor which, at first, he threatened.

II. Rehoboam was imprudent in the further management of this affair, and more and more infatuated. 1. He was very unadvised, in sending Adoram, who was over the tribute, to treat with

Verses 8—15.

It 'is a frequent fault of new kings, [and even of elective rulers,] who, to show their power, presently change their counsellors, and put in new officers, to gratify all their dependents; not considering who are wisest, but who have been their companions.' Patrick. SCOTT.

(8.) The young men that were grown up with him.] Many think this alludes to an oriental custom, of taking all those sons of the nobles of the realm, born at about the same time as the young prince, to be educated together with him, to live in the same place and way, and to be his constant companions, in physical exercises and sports, as in intellectual. Thus Xenophon describes the education of Cyrus. ED.

(15.) Cause was from the Lord.] 'Rather, "Jehovah so over-ruled the affair:" I give the sense, in preference to the idiom.' BOOTHR. 'The cause of all this confusion and anarchy, was Rehoboam's folly, cruelty, and despotic tyranny, and this was certainly not "from the Lord," nor does the original text speak this doctrine. It says, sibbah (from savav, to turn, change,) "the change or revolution was from the Lord;" which is consistent with all the preceding declarations. God stirred up the people to revolt from a man who had neither skill nor humanity to govern them.' GREENFIELD, after Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 16.

The Lord had indeed promised ten tribes to Jeroboam: but He had not commanded the people to revolt from the family of David; nor had He commissioned Jeroboam to wrench these tribes from Rehoboam. His purposes and declarations were not the motive of their conduct, and therefore formed no excuse for it. SCOTT.

Verse 17.

A considerable part of the priests and Levites, together with the tribe of Benjamin, and many of the Simeonites, dwelt in Judah; (Josh. 19:1—9.) and many others soon after joined them. (2 Chr. 11:13—17.) ID.

Verse 18.

It is not certain, whether Rehoboam sent Adoram to demand the taxes of the people, after their dispersion, as a feeble attempt to enforce his imprudent threats; or whether, previously to their departure from Shechem, he sent him to pacify them, with proposals for an accommodation.—This is the first time that we read of a king of Israel riding in a chariot; though no doubt Solomon had generally done so. (Cant. 3:9, 10.) ID.

Verses 19, 20.

The defection of Israel from Rehoboam is called rebellion against the house of David; as no misconduct of either Solomon or Rehoboam was sufficient to justify or even excuse it; and neither the people nor Jeroboam intended to obey God, though they accomplished his pur

20 And it came to pass, when all Israel heard that Jeroboam was come again, that they sent and called him unto the congregation, [f] and made him king over all Israel: there was [g] none that followed the house of David, but the tribe of Judah only.

[Practical Observations.]

21 ¶ And [h] when Rehoboam was come to Jerusalem, he assembled all the house of Judah, with the tribe of Benjamin, [i] an hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, which were warriors, to fight against the house of Israel, to bring the kingdom again to Rehoboam the son of Solomon.

22 But the word of God came unto [j] Shemaiah, [k] the man of God, saying,

23 Speak unto Rehoboam the son of Solomon king of Judah, and unto all the house of Judah and Benjamin, and to the remnant of the people, saying,

24 Thus saith the LORD, [l] Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren the children of Israel: return every man to his house; [m] for this thing is from me. [n] They hearkened therefore to the word of the LORD, and returned to depart, according to the word of the LORD.

25 Then Jero[o]boam [o] built [p] Shechem in mount Ephraim, and dwelt therein; and went out from thence, and built [q] Penuel.

26 And Jeroboam [r] said in his heart, [s] Now shall the kingdom return to the house of David:

27 If this people [t] go up to do sacrifice in the house of the LORD at them, v. 18. The tribute was the thing, and, therefore, Adoram the person, they most complained of; the very sight of him made them outrageous. He was one to whom they could not so much as give a patient hearing, but stoned him to death in a popular tumult. 2. Some think he was also unadvised, in making so much haste to Jerusalem, for thereby he deserted his friends, and gave advantage to his enemies, who had gone to their tents indeed, (v. 16.) in disgust, but did not offer to make Jeroboam king, till Rehoboam was gone, v. 20. See how soon this foolish prince went from one extreme to the other. He hectored and talked big, when he thought all was his own, but sunk, and looked very mean, when he saw himself in danger. It is common for those that are most haughty in their prosperity, to be most abject in adversity.

III. God forbade his attempt to recover by the sword what he had lost. What was done, was of God, who would not suffer, 1. That it should be undone again, as it would be, if Rehoboam got the better, and reduced the ten tribes. Nor, 2. That more should be done to the prejudice of the house of David, as would be, if Jeroboam should get the better, and conquer the two tribes.

(1.) It was brave in Rehoboam, to design to reduce the revolters by force. His courage came to him, when he was come to Jerusalem, v. 21. There he thought himself among his fast friends, who generously adhered to him, and appeared for him. Judah and Benjamin presently raised an army of 180,000 men, for the recovery of their king's right to the ten tribes, and were resolved to stand by him (as we say) with their lives and fortunes; having either not such cause, or rather not such a disposition, to complain as the rest.

(2.) It was more brave in Rehoboam, to desist, when God, by a prophet, ordered him to lay down his arms. He would not lose a kingdom tamely, for then he had been unworthy the title of a prince; yet he would not contend for it, in opposition to God, for then he had been unworthy the title of an Israelite. These two considerations should reconcile us to our losses and troubles, that God is the Author of them; and our brethren are the instruments of them, let us not therefore meditate revenge. When we know God's mind, we must submit to it, how much soever it crosses our own mind. In the next reign, God allowed them to fight, and gave them victory, 2 Chr. 13.

V. 24—33. We have here the beginning of the reign of Jeroboam. He built Shechem first, then Penuel, and probably, had a palace in each of them for himself; (v. 25.) the former in Ephraim, the latter in Gad, on the other side Jordan. This might be proper; but he formed another project to establish his kingdom, which was fatal to the interests of religion in it.

I. What he designed, was, 1. By some effectual means to secure those to himself, who had now chosen him their king, and to prevent their return to the house of David, v. 26, 27. Many that have been advanced in one tumult, have been hurled down in another: what is got by wrong and usurpation, cannot be enjoyed or kept with any security or satisfaction. 2. He was distrustful of God's promise, (ch. 11: 38.) and would contrive ways and means, and sinful ones too, for his own safety. A practical disbelief of God's all-sufficiency, is at the bottom of all our treacherous departures from Him.

II. The way he took to do this, v. 27. Jerusalem was the place God had chosen to put his name there; Solomon's temple was there, which God had, in the sight of all Israel, and in the memory of many now living, taken solemn possession of, in a cloud of glory. At the altar there, the priests of the Lord attended, there all Israel were to keep the feasts, and thither they were to bring their sacrifices.

Now, 1. Jeroboam apprehended that if the people continued to do this, they would, in time, return to the house of David. If they cleave to their old religion, they will go back to their old king.

2. He therefore dissuaded them from going up to Jerusalem, pretending to consult their ease; (v. 28.) 'you have gone long enough to Jerusalem.' So some read it.

3. He provided for the assistance of their devotion at home: set up two golden calves, as tokens or signs of the divine presence. Some charitably think his calves were made to represent the mercy-seat, and the cherubims over the ark; but, more probably, as he had lived among the Egyptians, for some time, they were in the form of their god Apis, in the similitude of a bull or calf. By these he intended, no doubt, to represent, or rather make present, not any false god, as Moloch or

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20. Many wise and pious men have had the severe affliction of foolish and wicked children: and as the 'Lord alone giveth wisdom,' even good instructions will not ensure their prudent and proper conduct. But bad examples generally defeat the effect of wise counsels: and those who are likely to inherit great dignity are commonly so flattered and indulged, that it is almost a miracle, if they are not intoxicated with pride and sensual lusts. —Man is a discontented being; and while one desire remains ungratified, and one inconvenience unremoved, he is naturally more disposed to murmur, than to be thankful either to God or man, for the multiplied unmerited blessings with which he is surrounded.—Of these unreasonable dissatisfactions, ambitious men are ready to take the advantage, and put themselves in the way to head any formidable opposition to 'the powers that be,' when it can subserve their own purposes. (1 Sam. 8:6—9. 2 Sam. 15: 1—6. 20:1,2. P. O. 2 Sam. 15:1—12.) It requires great wisdom to prevent or defeat these pernicious machinations: but weak men are commonly the most obstinate, and relish no counsel but what flatters their silly pride, and humors their unreasonable prejudices: and when the companions of a prince's pleasures are his select counsellors; his inclinations, however mischievous, will be preferred to the important interests of the whole kingdom. (2 Chr. 24:17,18. Esth. 2:1—4. Dan. 6:12—17.) Yet experience decides that, in general, men best mount by first stooping, prevail by yielding, and rule by becoming serviceable, and giving good words: and when this consists with duty, it is in most cases our wisdom and interest.—We need not wonder that those persons who forget the mercies of God, and oppose his appointments with ingratitude and contempt, should recompense their earthly benefactors with reproaches, insults, or injuries: but the Lord will take care of the characters, families, and interests of his faithful servants; and they may safely leave their cause in his hand, though they cannot see to it themselves. Chemosh, but the true God only, as he declares, v. 28. So it was no violation of the first commandment, but the second. And he chose thus to engage the people's devotion, because he knew there were many among them, so in love with images, that, for the sake of the calves, they would willingly quit God's temple, where all images were forbidden. He set up two, by degrees to break people off from the belief of the unity of the godhead, which would pave the way to the polytheism of the Pagans. He set them up, one in the utmost border of his country northward, the other southward, as if to be the guardians and protectors of the kingdom. Beth-el lay close to Judah: he set up one there, to tempt those of Rehoboam's subjects over to him, who were inclined to image-worship. The other at Dan, was for the convenience of those that lay most remote that way. Micah's images had been set up there, and great veneration paid to them for many ages, Judg. 18: 30. Beth-el signifies the house of God, which gave some color to the superstition; but the prophet called it Beth-aven, the house of vanity, or iniquity.

4. The people complied, fond enough of the novelty, v. 30. They that thought it much to go to Jerusalem, to worship God according to his institution, made no difficulty of going twice as far, to Dan, to worship Him according to their own inventions. Or, they are said to go to one of the calves at Dan, because Abijah, king of Judah, within 20 years, recovered Beth-el, (2 Chr. 13: 19.) and, it is likely, removed the golden calf, or forbade the use of it. This became a sin; and a great sin it was, against the express letter of the second commandment. God had never allowed the worship of Him by images. Hereby they justified their fathers in making the calf at Horeb, though God had so fully shown his displeasure against them for it, and threatened to visit for it in the day of visitation, Ex. 32: 34. So it was as great a contempt of God's wrath as of his law; and thus they added sin to sin.

5. Having set up the gods, he fitted up accommodations for them: wherein he varied from the divine appointment, we are here told; which intimates that, in other things, he imitated what was done in Judah, (v. 32.) as well as he could. See how one error multiplied into many.

(1.) He made a house of high places, or of altars; one temple at Dan, we may suppose, and another at Beth-el, (v. 31.) and in each many altars, probably, complaining of it as an inconvenience, that in the temple of Jerusalem there was but one. The multiplying of altars passed with some for devotion, but God, by the prophet, puts another construction on it; (Hos. 8: 11.) Ephraim has made many altars to sin.

(2.) He made priests of the lowest of the people; and good enough they were to be priests to his calves, and too good. He made priests from the extremest parts of the people, i. e. some out of every corner of the country, whom he ordered to reside among their neighbors to instruct them in his appointments, and reconcile them to them. Thus were they dispersed as the Levites, but were not of the sons of Levi. But the priests of the high places, or altars, he ordered to reside in Beth-el, as the priests at Jerusalem, (v. 32.) to attend the public service.

(3.) The feast of tabernacles, on the 15th day of the 7th month, he adjourned to the 15th of the 8th month, (v. 32.) the month which he devised of his own heart, to show his power in ecclesiastical matters, v. 33. The passover and pentecost he observed in their proper season, or not at all, or with little solemnity in comparison with this.

(4.) He himself assuming a power to make priests, no marvel if he undertook to do the priests' work with his own hands: He offered on the altar twice, v. 32, 33. also he burnt incense. This was connived at in him, because of a piece with the rest of his irregularities; but in king Uzziah it was immediately punished with the plague of leprosy. He did it himself, to make him look great conveniency and inclinations: though the priests, Levites, and many Israelites were honorable exceptions. (Note, 2 Chr. 11:13—17.)—Perhaps the people would be less shocked at worshipping the God of Israel, under the similitude of the golden calf, than if they had been at once invited to worship Baal: but it made way for that species of idolatry also. Thus the worship of images of Christ, and similar superstitions, in the ancient Romish church, soon introduced the worship of saints and angels. (Notes, Ex. 20:4—6.) Scott. Most commentators suppose, with Henry, that Jeroboam made these images in imitation of the Apis and Mnevis, &c. of Egypt. The symbolical worship of the bull, cow and ox in the E. is an endless subject. The black bull, the yellow cow, and the red heifer, with their various accompanying symbols appear on the monuments of Egypt, and the bovine worship seems to have been exceedingly popular throughout its whole extent. Champollion (Pantheon Egyptien), says 'The divine cow, Ahe or Ehe, is called in the hieroglyphics "generatrix of the Sun," and as the Sun was the father of the Egyptian gods, whose relative power is expressed in the reputed antecedence of their birth, this divine cow claims a high place and antiquity.' We can easily perceive how inveterate this worship must become with those who were taught, as the Egyptians were, the dogma of a male and female principle (Amonra and Neith) of the universe, who formed one god, and conjointly were the activators and producers of all things; a faith still extant in China. A cut is given from the 'Harper's tomb,' (note, 10:18:19. latter part,) of a red cow, covered with a blue covering, reticulated with white, and spotted with deep blue. The moon appears between her horns (indicating the female principle of the universe?); and ostrich feathers (emblems of truth and justice?); a bauble or bulla, hangs about her neck signifying, say some, the generative power, and a flabellum, fly-flap or scourge, signifying severity, (sometimes combined with a crook, as in the extremely ancient figures of Osiris, signifying moderation,) still carried before the pope of Rome, it is said. Perhaps we may hence gather, why Moses connected the 'red heifer' with the abhorrence due to crime, and sin. Ed.

(27.) And they shall kill me.] Says Dr. A. Clarke, 'He found he had little cause to trust this fickle people; though they had declared for him, it was more from caprice, desire of change, and novelty, than from any regular and praise-worthy principle.' If this was the natural effect of national prosperity (4:20:25.) on imperfect human nature, what reason have we, a nation blest with such unequalled prosperity, to seek, in this our day, the things which belong to our peace! What reason have we to strain every nerve for the education of all, both young and old, in the fear of God—lest He, the Author of our so peculiar blessings, find in us ingratitude which must be punished, or lawlessness which brings swift destruction, pride which goes before a fall, vain-glory which lulls to a blind security, unfounded in virtue, false as fatal; and lastly, lest, instead of wise dependence on his love, and obedience to his will, He, finding in our land jealousy, party-rage, self-seeking ambition, fanatic shortsightedness, to foment discord and disunion, correct us in anger with scourges, we have prepared for ourselves, by indulgence in evil passions, reckless of God, his religion, his worship and his fear! Leave us not, God of our mercies, leave us not to ourselves! God of our fathers, be thou our God, and teach us, what alone is the security of a nation, teach us to be thy people! Save us from political divisions, from fanaticism of all kinds, from demagogues like Jeroboam, who make a country to sin; the worship of golden calves, or counterfeit patriots, set up on high by the people, or by partisans for the people's idolatry! Ed.

(M. R. d. Notes, 14:9—16.)—Even unto Dan.] Perhaps they often went from the southern part of the land, even to Dan, to maintain communion with those who worshipped there, who probably would not be backward in repaying their civility. Scott.

Verse 31.

Thus he exempted the people from paying tithes to the Levites, whom he drove out of his kingdom, because they would not concur in his idolatry: (2 Chr. 11:13—17.) and he paid court to the other tribes, by admitting them to the priesthood, of which many were ambitious: (Num. 16:1—4, 8—11.) and in both respects he, no doubt, thought himself, and was considered by others, a consummate politician. (2 Sam. 15 31. 2 Chr. 13:4—22. Job 12:13—25. Prov. 21:30. 1 Cor. 1:20—25.) Id.

32 And Jeroboam ordained a feast in the eighth month, on the fifteenth day of the month, [g] like unto the feast that is in Judah, and he * offered upon the altar. So did he in Beth-el, † sacrificing unto the calves that he had made: and [h] he placed in Beth-el the priests of the high places which he had made.

33 So he ‡ offered upon the altar, which he had made in Beth-el, the fifteenth day of the eighth month, even [i] in the month which he had devised of his own heart; and ordained a feast unto the children of Israel: and [k] he offered upon the altar, § and burnt incense.

CHAP. XIII.

A man of God sent from Judah prophesies to Jeroboam, while burning incense, that Josiah of David's race should defile the altar at Beth-el; and he gives him a sign, 1—3. Jeroboam's hand, stretched forth against him, withers; and the altar is rent, 4, 5. Jeroboam's hand is restored at the prophet's prayer, 6. He refuses entertainment and a reward, and leaves Beth-el, 7—10. He is seduced, and brought back, by the lie of an old prophet, who afterwards denounces the judgment of God against him for his disobedience, 11—22. A lion kills him on his way home, 23—25. The old prophet fetches his body, buries it with lamentations, and confirms his prophecy, 26—32. Jeroboam persists in his evil ways, 33, 34.

AND, behold, there came [a] a man of God out of Judah, [b] by the word of the LORD, unto Beth-el: and [c] Jeroboam stood by the altar to ‖ burn incense.

among the people, and to get the reputation of a devout man; also to grace the solemnity of his new festival, with which it is likely, at this time, he joined the feast of the dedication of his altar.

Thus, Jeroboam sinned himself; yet perhaps excused himself to the world and his own conscience, with this, that he did not do so ill as Solomon did, who worshipped other gods. He made Israel to sin, drew them off from the worship of God, and entailed idolatry on their seed. And hereby they were punished for deserting the thrones of the house of David.

The learned Mr. Whiston, in his chronology for the adjusting of the annals of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, supposes Jeroboam changed the calculation of the year, and made it of but 11 months, and that by those years the reigns of the kings of Israel are measured, till Jehu's revolution, and no longer; in which interval, 11 years of the annals of Judah answer to 12 in those of Israel.

CHAP. XIII. In the close of the foregoing ch. we left Jeroboam attending his altar at Beth-el, and there we find him, the beginning of this, when he received a testimony from God against his idolatry and apostasy. This was sent him by a prophet, a man of God that lived in Judah, who is the principal subject of the story of this ch.

V. 1—10. Here is, I. A messenger sent to Jeroboam, to signify to him God's displeasure against his idolatry, v. 1. This was instead of the army, which was countermanded, ch. 12: 24. How bold the messenger, that durst attack the king in his pride, and interrupt the solemnity he was proud of! They that go on God's errand, must not fear the face of man; they know who will bear them out. How kind was He that sent him to warn Jeroboam, (now he is but dedicating his altar, before the deceitfulness of his sin hardened his heart,) of the wrath of God revealed from heaven against his ungodliness and unrighteousness!

II. The message; directed, not to Jeroboam, or to the people, but to the altar, the stones of which will sooner hear and yield, than they who were mad on their idols, and deaf to divine calls. Yet, in threatening the altar, he threatens the founder and worshippers. What is foretold of the altar, (v. 2.) is, that, in process of time, a prince of the house of David, Josiah by name, should pollute it by sacrificing the idolatrous priests themselves upon it, and burning the bones of dead men. It was about 356 years, ere this prediction was fulfilled, yet it was spoken of as sure and nigh at hand, for a thousand years with God are but as one day. Nothing more contingent and arbitrary than the giving of names to persons, yet Josiah is here named above 300 years before he was born. Nothing future is hidden from God. There are names in the book of the divine prescience, (Philip. 4: 3.) names written in heaven.

III. A sign is given to confirm the truth of this prediction, that the altar should be shaken to pieces by an invisible power, and the ashes of the sacrifice scattered, (v. 3.) which came to pass immediately, v. 5. as, 1. A proof the prophet was sent of God; Mark 16: 20. 2. A present indication of God's displeasure against these idolatrous sacrifices. 3. As a reproach to the people, whose hearts were harder than these stones. 4. As a specimen of what should be done in the accomplishment of this prophecy by Joshua; the altar was now rent, in token of its being then ruined.

IV. Jeroboam's hand withered, v. 4. Instead of trembling at the message, as he might well have done, he assaulted him that brought it, in defiance of the wrath of which he was warned, and contempt of that grace which sent him the warning. Rebuke a sinner and he will hate thee, and do thee a mischief if he can. Yet God's prophets must rather expose themselves than betray their trust: He that employs them, will protect them. When Jeroboam's hand was stretched out to burn incense to his calves, it was not withered; but when against a prophet, he shall have no use of it, till he humble himself. Of all the wickedness of the wicked, there is none more provoking to God, than their malicious attempts against his prophets, of whom He has said, Touch them not, do them no harm. God has many ways of disabling the enemies of his church to execute their mischievous purposes. If God, in justice, harden the hearts of sinners, so that the hand they have stretched out in sin, they cannot pull in again by repentance, that is a spiritual judgment, represented by this, and much more dreadful.

V. The sudden healing of the hand, upon his submission, v. 6. That word of God which should have touched his conscience, humbled him not; but this which touched his bone and his flesh, brings down his proud spirit. The time may come, when those that hate the preaching, would be glad of the prayers, of faithful ministers. But observe,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 21—33. It is in vain to attempt to disannul the Lord's counsel: when his revealed will is contrary to our pursuits, they should be relinquished, however great our apparent loss may be; and it is his will, and should be the desire of all in authority, as much as possible to prevent the effusion of human blood.—Unbelieving men judge by appearances, and often conclude, that safety and prosperity can be obtained by those measures alone, which the Word of God condemns. But faith waits upon God in the path of duty, for the performance of his own promises, whatever difficulties may seem to impede it: and it perceives and aims at nobler objects, than the success of any temporal project, or even the preservation of life itself.—The duplicity of politicians often consists, in concealing their selfish purposes under plausible, ostensible pretences: but men frequently conjecture aright in such matters; and God sees and will expose the thought of their hearts, notwithstanding all their disguises.—The benefit of the public is often the plea; personal impunity for their crimes, the retaining of their dignity, or the increase of their own authority, are the real motives of their conduct. The people, however, are generally willing to gratify their rulers in matters of religion, provided it be easy, cheap, pompous, or sensual: and if a few scruples intervene, the revival of some old superstition, some plea of antiquity, or of liberality of sentiment, or of agreement in the main with more scrupulous persons, though expedient alterations are adopted, will generally conciliate the minds of the majority to any religion, which suits their conveniency, agrees with their interests, and does not disquiet their consciences, or disturb them in gratifying their inclinations.—When persons in authority aim to render religion conducive to their secular purposes, they generally love to bring every thing under their own management. But the pride, arrogance, and enmity of the human heart, never appears more atrocious and odious, than when it presumptuously dares to change the divine appointments, for those 'which a man hath devised of his own heart,' and to mould the worship of God into contrariety to his will; when ministers, so called, can be found shameless enough to countenance this arrogance; and when whole nations of professing worshippers quietly submit to it. Indeed nothing in such a case, but a torrent of ungodliness, and most awful judgments, can be expected. SCOTT.

Verses 32, 33.

Jeroboam affected the credit of devising an entirely new system; and perhaps he hoped to draw in those who still went up to Jerusalem, by having his feast at a different time. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. To incense.] (3·2, 3. 12:32, 33. 2 Chr. 26:16—23.) Jeroboam seems on this occasion to have officiated himself; and to have burned incense at the same altar, on which the sacrifices had been offered. As the typical meaning of these institutions was not at all understood, and as the divine appointment was entirely disregarded, every kind of innovation was made without scruple [Note, Lev. 10: (1.)] SCOTT.

2 And he cried against the altar in the word of the LORD, and said, [d] O altar, altar, thus saith the LORD: Behold, a child shall be born unto the house of David, [*] Josiah by name; and upon thee shall he offer the priests of the high places that burn incense upon thee, and men's bones shall be burnt upon thee.

3 And [f] he gave a sign the same day, saying, This is the sign which the LORD hath spoken; Behold, the altar shall be rent, and the ashes that are upon it shall be poured out.

4 And it came to pass, when king Jeroboam heard the saying of the man of God, which had cried against the altar in Beth-el, that he put forth his hand from the altar, saying, [g] Lay hold on him. And [h] his hand, which he put forth against him, dried up, so that he could not pull it in again to him.

5 The altar also was rent, and the ashes poured out from the altar, [i] according to the sign which the man of God had given by the word of the LORD.

6 And the king answered and said unto the man of God, [k] Entreat now the face of the LORD thy God, and pray for me, that my hand may be restored me again. [l] And the man of God besought the [*] LORD, and the king's hand was restored him again, and became as it was before.

7 And the king said unto the man of God, Come home with me, and [m] refresh thyself, [n] and I will give thee a reward.

8 And the man of God said unto the king, [o] If thou wilt give me half thine house, [p] I will not go in with thee, neither will I eat bread nor drink water in this place:

9 For [q] so was it charged me by the word of the LORD, saying, [r] Eat no bread, nor drink water, nor turn again by the same way that thou camest.

10 So he went another way, and returned not by the way that he came to Beth-el.

[Practical Observations.]

11 ¶ Now there dwelt [s] an old prophet in Beth-el; and his † sons [t] came and told him all the works, that the man

He does not desire his sin might be pardoned, and his heart changed, only that his hand might be restored; thus Pharaoh would have Moses pray God to take away this death only, (Ex. 10: 17.) not this sin. The prophet, as became a man of God, renders good for evil, and immediately addresses himself to God for him. Those only are entitled to the blessing Christ pronounced on the persecuted, that learn of Him to pray for their persecutors, Matt. 5: 10, 44. When the prophet thus honored God, by showing himself of a forgiving spirit, God put this further honor on him, that, at his word, He recalled the judgment, and by another miracle healed the withered hand; that by the goodness of God Jeroboam might be led to repentance, and if he were not broken by the judgment, yet might be melted by the mercy. With both he seemed affected for the present, but the impressions wore off.

VI. The prophet's refusal of Jeroboam's kind invitation: in which observe, 1. God forbade his messenger to eat or drink in Beth-el, (v. 9.) to show his detestation of their execrable idolatry, and apostasy, and to teach us not to have fellowship with the works of darkness, lest we have infection from them, or encourage them. He must not turn back the same way, but deliver his message, as it were, as he passes along. He shall not seem to be sent on purpose, (they were unworthy such a favor,) but as if he only called by the way, his spirit being stirred, like Paul's at Athens, as he passed, and saw their devotions. God would, by this command, try his prophet, as he did Ezekiel, whether he would not be rebellious, like that rebellious house, Ezek. 2: 8. 2. Jeroboam was so affected with the cure of his hand, that he was willing to express his gratitude to the prophet, and pay him for his prayers, v. 7. Favors to the body will make even graceless men seem grateful to good ministers. 3. The prophet, though hungry, weary, and, perhaps, poor, in obedience to the divine command, refused both the entertainment, and the reward. He might have supposed his acceptance would give an opportunity of discoursing further with the king, in order to his effectual reformation, now he was convinced; yet he will not think himself wiser than God, but, like a faithful, careful messenger, hastens home when he has done his errand. They have little learned the lesson of self-denial, that cannot forbear one forbidden meal.

V. 11—22. The man of God, over-persuaded by an old prophet, comes back with him, and dines in Beth-el, contrary to the command. Here we find how dear his dinner cost him. Observe with wonder,

I. The old prophet's wickedness. I cannot but call him a false prophet, and a bad man; it being much easier to believe, that, from such a character should be extorted a confirmation of what the man of God said, (as we find, v. 32.) than that a true prophet, and a good man, should tell such a deliberate lie, and father it on God. Perhaps, he was trained up among the sons of the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. The Lord often meets sinners in the midst of their crimes, with alarming indications of his displeasure, to show that 'their way is perverse before Him.'—it requires great fortitude to deliver faithfully the messages of God, especially to those in authority. But the Lord will bear those out whom He sends, and who simply trust and obey Him.—The Lord is peculiarly offended with those, who attempt any thing against such intrepid reprovers of sin; and they, who have most insulted his servants, are often brought by affliction to pay court to them, and to desire their prayers.—When persons are living in open sins, and causing others to sin by their influence and authority, the 'men of God' should manifest their abhorrence of their crimes, by refusing to accept of any favors from them, and by separating from all intercourse with them. And when those who are in low circumstances act in this manner, with firmness and meekness, and plainly assign the reasons of their conduct; it will be one of the most alarming and convincing warnings, which can possibly be given. Ministers and Christians must often go among ungodly people, but they ought never to make themselves familiar with them; and should show that they are so uneasy in their company, that none of their temporal good things can bribe them, needlessly to prolong, or repeat their visits. In order to this, they must be superior to the love of worldly pleasure and interest, inured to hardship and self-denial, and well acquainted with the commandments of God —In the mystery of Providence, false religion is permitted to be planted, and to prevail to the deceiving of great multitudes: but the Lord keeps the times and seasons in his own power; He foresees and determines those events, which are most distant, and appear most contingent; and He will in his appointed time destroy every species of irreligion or superstition, by one of the house of David, of far nobler name and greater excellency than Josiah.—But the tokens of his displeasure, on the instruments of iniquity, proclaim his awful vengeance on the sinners themselves: and none will become sacrifices to his justice with deeper detestation and contempt, than hireling ministers, who for filthy lucre have countenanced false religion, to the destruction of the souls of those who blindly followed such blind guides. SCOTT.

As the destruction of this newly instituted worship was to be expressly foretold, and the stupidity of the idolaters themselves to be severely reproved, this prophet addressed himself to the altar, and not to the worshippers. 20 And it came to pass, as they sat at the table, that [e] the word of the LORD came unto the prophet that brought him back:

22 But camest back, and hast eaten bread and drunk water in the place, of the which the LORD did say to thee, Eat no bread, and drink no water; [h] thy carcass shall not come unto the sepulchre of thy fathers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11—19. The cause of God admits of no neutrality. (Matt. 12:29,30.) In times of general apostasy, or increasing infidelity and ungodliness, we are especially called to bear our testimony, without yielding to fear or shame: and if any professed Christian will not confess Christ in this world, Christ will not own him in the day of judgment.—They are the most dangerous, because the most plausible and unsuspected, of all tempters to real Christians, whose candor makes them willing to hope the best of them, to credit their professions, and to return their civilities. Having learned to be silent, when called to defend the truth, they soon learn to forge lies in the name of God, when it can answer their purpose; and, by various specious pretences, they obtain the esteem of the unwary, and abuse their confidence by inveigling them into disobedience: so that tempters of this description often prevail, when the terrors of persecution, and the allurements of preferment, have been resolutely withstood. But for our own sakes, and for the credit of the Gospel, let us all with one consent withdraw from worldly professors of religion, and be on our guard against them: let them decidedly serve God, or Baal, that we may know what they are; or let us refuse to have any acquaintance with them.

prophets, in one of Samuel's colleges not far off, whence he retained the name of a prophet, but, growing worldly and profane, the spirit of prophecy was departed from him. If he had been a good prophet, he would have reproved Jeroboam's idolatry, and not have suffered his sons to attend his altars, as, it should seem, they did.

Whether he had any good design in fetching back the man of God, is not certain. But, it is certain he took a very bad method; he imposed on him his former character as a prophet, and pretended he had a vision of an angel that sent him on this errand; but it was all a lie, a banter on prophecy, and profane in the highest degree. When this old prophet is spoken of, (2 K. 23: 18.) he is called the prophet that came out of Samaria, whereas there was no such place as Samaria, till long after; (ch. 16: 24.) therefore I take it he is so called there, though he was at Beth-el, because he was like those prophets of Samaria, who caused God's people Israel to err, Jer. 23: 13.

II. The good prophet's weakness, in suffering himself to be thus imposed on, v. 19. Good people are more in danger of being drawn from their duty by plausible pretences of divinity and sanctity, than by external inducements; we have therefore need to beware of false prophets, and not believe every spirit. [For God has given us the faculties necessary to try the spirits.]

III. The proceedings of divine justice, hereupon; and we may well wonder that the wicked prophet, who told the lie, and did the mischief, went unpunished, while the holy man of God, who was drawn by him into sin, was suddenly and severely punished for it. Certainly there must be a judgment to come, when these things will be called over again, and when those that sinned most, and suffered least, in this world, will receive according to their works. The message delivered to the man of God was strange; yet it was more strange, the old prophet himself should be the messenger: of this we can give no account, but that God would have it so, as He spake to Balaam by his ass, and read Saul his doom by the devil in Samuel's likeness; we may think God designed hereby, 1. To startle the lying prophet, and make him sensible of his sin; the message could not but affect him the more, when he himself had the delivering of it, and had so strong an impression made on his spirit by it, that he cried out, as one in an agony, v. 21. He had reason to think, if he must die for his disobedience in a small matter, who sinned by surprise, of how much sorer punishment he should be thought worthy, who had belied an angel of God, and cheated a man of God, by a deliberate forgery. Perhaps, it had a good effect on him; those who preach God's wrath to others, have hard hearts indeed, if they fear it not themselves. 2. To put the greater mortification on the prophet that was deceived, and to show what they must expect, who hearken to the great deceiver; they that yield to him as a tempter, will be terrified by him as a tormentor; whom he now fawns upon, he will afterward fly upon, and whom he draws into sin, he will do what he can to drive to despair.

V. 23—34. Here is, I. The death of the deceived, disobedient prophet. The old prophet that (18.) It is difficult to perceive the old prophet's motive for all this base pains, except he wished to destroy the 'man of God,' thus confirming Jeroboam in his wicked way, and thus ingratiating himself with the king for the sake of his sons. But this supposes him to be so depraved, as to continue in his purpose while he believed both that this 'man of God' was sent by God, and that his disobedience would be his death! Jealousy of a prophet more honored of God than himself, or mere gossiping curiosity might possibly have influenced him, as well as pure malice or ambition. ED.

Verses 20—22.

As the Lord inspired Balaam, contrary to his intentions, to pronounce blessings, and to utter, though doubtless with the greatest reluctance, prophecies concerning Israel: (Num. 23:7, 8. 24:1—13.) so was this prophet constrained to pronounce sentence against the man of God, whom he had seduced into disobedience; and thus to publish the shame of his own most impious imposture, which also implied against himself a far more dreadful doom, except he repented. SCOTT.

(20.) That brought him back.] 'Asher heshibo. Rather, whom he had brought back, and thus these same words are translated in v. 23. where they cannot be translated otherwise. So we may consider the word of the Lord as delivered to the true prophet; and then the sentence (v. 21.) is pronounced by God Himself, calling to him out of heaven, (as in Gen. 22:11.) and of this, v. 26 assures us, where it has "which HE spake." Josephus expressly asserts, that the sentence was declared by God to the true prophet, and so does the Arabic.

Verses 23—32.

'Here is a cluster of miracles; that the lion, contrary to his nature, did not eat the carcass, nor kill the ass, nor meddle with the travellers that passed by, nor with the old prophet and his ass: and that the ass stood so quietly, and was not frighted at the sight of the lion, nor drunk, that he saddled for him the ass, to wit, for the prophet whom he had brought back.

24 And when he was gone, [i] a lion met him by the way, and slew him: and his carcass was cast in the way, and the ass stood by it; the lion also stood by the carcass.

25 And, behold, men passed by, and saw the carcass cast in the way, and the lion standing by the carcass: and they came and told it in the city where the old prophet dwelt.

26 And when the prophet that brought him back from the way heard thereof, he said, It is [k] the man of God who was disobedient unto the word of the LORD: therefore the LORD hath delivered him unto the lion, which hath * torn him, and slain him, according to the word of the LORD which he spake unto him.

27 And he spake to his sons, saying, Saddle me the ass. And they saddled him.

28 And he went, and found his carcass cast in the way, and the ass and the lion standing by the carcass: [l] the lion had not eaten the carcass, nor † torn the ass.

29 And the prophet took up the carcass of the man of God, and laid it upon the ass, and brought it back: and the old prophet came to the city to mourn, and to bury him.

30 And he laid his carcass in his own grave; and they [m] mourned over him, saying, Alas, my brother!

31 And it came to pass, after he had buried him, that he spake to his sons, saying, When I am dead, then bury me in the sepulchre wherein the man of God is buried; [n] lay my bones beside his bones:

32 For [o] the saying which he cried by the word of the LORD against the altar in Beth-el and against all [p] the houses of the high places which are [q] in the cities of Samaria, shall surely come to pass.

33 ¶ After this thing [r] Jeroboam returned not from his evil way, but ‡ made again of the lowest of the people priests of the high places: [s] whosoever would, he § consecrated him, and he became one of the priests of the high places.

34 And this thing [t] became sin unto the house of Jeroboam, even [u] to cut it off, and to destroy it from off the face of the earth.

had deluded him, as if to make some amends for his wrong, or help prevent the mischief threatened him, furnished him with an ass to ride home on, v. 23, 24. See 1 Sam. 14: 43. But we must consider, 1. His offence was great; he could not be so certain of the countermand sent by another, as he was of the command given to himself; nor had he any ground to think the command would be recalled, when the reason of it remained in force. He had great reason to suspect the honesty of this old prophet; he should too have taken time to beg direction from God, and not have complied so soon. Was he hungry? Yet had he never read, that man lives not by bread alone? 2. His death was for the glory of God; thus it appeared, (1.) That nothing is more provoking to Him than disobedience to an express command, though in a small matter. (2.) That God is displeased at the sins of his own people, and no man shall be protected in disobedience by the sanctity of his profession, the dignity of his office, his nearness to God, or any good services he has done for Him. Perhaps, God, by this, intended, in a way of righteous judgment, to harden Jeroboam's heart, since he was not reformed by the withering of his hand: he would be apt to make a bad use of it, to say the prophet was well enough served for meddling with his altar; nay, that Providence had punished him for his insolence; however, by this He intended to warn all those whom He employs, strictly to observe their orders, at their peril.

II. The wonderful preservation of his dead body, a token of God's mercy remembered in the midst of wrath; the lion did not devour it, nor so much as tear the ass, v. 24, 25, 28. nay, did not set on the travellers that passed by, nor on the old prophet; his commission was, to kill the prophet; hitherto he should go, but no further: thus God showed that though angry with him, his anger was turned away, and the punishment went no further than death.

III. The care the old prophet took of his burial; when he heard of the unusual accident, it had well become him to ask why the lion was not sent against him and his house, rather than against the good man he had cheated: he was, in effect, the murderer, and now his conscience so far relents, that he weeps over him, and, like Joab at Abner's funeral, is compelled to be a mourner for him whom he had been the death of; they said, Alas, my brother! v. 30. The case was indeed very lamentable, that so good a man, a prophet so faithful, and so bold in God's cause, should, for one offence, die as a criminal, while an old, lying prophet lives at ease, and an idolatrous prince in pomp and power. Thy way, O God, is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters. We cannot [always] judge of men by their sufferings, nor of sins by their present punishments; with some, the flesh is destroyed, that the spirit may be saved, while with others, the flesh is pampered, that the soul may ripen for hell.

IV. The charge the old prophet gave his sons concerning his own burial, v. 31. though a lying prophet, yet he desired to die the death of a true prophet. The reason he gives, is, because what he cried against the altar of Beth-el, that men's bones should be burnt on it, shall surely come to pass, v. 32. Thus, 1. He ratifies the prediction, that the word might be established, if possible, to convince and reclaim Jeroboam. 2. He honors the deceased prophet, as one whose word would not fall to the ground, though he did; ministers die, die prematurely, it may be; but the Word of the Lord endures for ever, and does not die with them. 3. He consults his own interest; it was

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 20—34. Nothing can excuse any act of wilful disobedience: the tempter 'hath the greater sin,' but the tempted is deeply criminal; and the offences of those who are much honored and employed of God, are of all the most dishonorable to Him, as they rivet the prejudices and embolden the blasphemies of his enemies. Such offenders therefore shall by no means escape correction in this world: and perhaps their very tempters shall be employed to denounce, or inflict, the chastisements of the Lord upon them; or in other respects they shall be made very severe and alarming: while the wicked frequently escape, in this life, being 'reserved unto the day of judgment to be punished.'—The exact obedience of the irrational creatures to their Maker, forms a reproach of man's rebellion: for He can restrain or change the very nature of every creature, to render it subservient to his wise and righteous purposes.—Happy are they, who are habitually ready for death: even if the Lord shall call them hence, by some awful rebuke for an incidental transgression, while they are made useful warnings to others, they will be found safe and happy themselves. (2 K. 22:15—20. 1 Cor. 11:29—34.)—But many will show respect to the servants of the Lord, assent to the truth of their words, appear to lament their death, and wish to have their lot with them in another world; who yet live and die impenitent: (Num. 23:10.) Let all then fear provoking God to leave them to final hardness of heart. SCOTT.

betook itself to flight. And more than this, the lion stood by the carcass a long time, till this strange news was carried into the city; . . . which made the miracle the more illustrious, and plainly showed that this did not happen by chance.' Bp. Patrick. All these miraculous circumstances marked the death of the man of God as a divine rebuke for his disobedience, in eating bread at idolatrous Beth-el; and both counteracted the conclusion, which Jeroboam might have been tempted to draw from his death, against the truth of his message, and formed a solemn proof, how God abhorred, and would have all his people abhor, this newly instituted worship.—The man of God from Judah appears to have spoken more prophecies, than are mentioned in the beginning of the chapter. SCOTT.

(24.) As sin lies in the intention of an act, when this poor prophet thought he was obeying God's command (by the lying prophet, v. 18.) in going back to eat, as well as in delivering his message to Jeroboam, why is he destroyed? Perhaps he was not careful to inquire into the previous character of this lying prophet; perhaps faith in the truth of his own mission (see Deut. 13:1, 2, 3.) yielded now too easily and agreeably to the monitions of appetite, and suffering himself to be influenced by this motive, rather than a higher, he sinned. We may well suppose that if he had not the means of knowing when God spake to him, and when He did not, a just God would not have punished him. Perhaps God saw something too which we cannot see. Charity leads us to suppose, that the circumstances of his death (which God chooses for all) were ordered as an example to others, while mercy was extended to his soul by a merciful God. ED.

CHAP. XIV.

Jeroboam sends his wife, disguised, to Ahijah the prophet, to inquire concerning his son Abijah, who was sick, 1—4. Ahijah, forewarned by God, denounces to her the destruction of Jeroboam's family, the death of her son, and the rejection of Israel, 5—16. Abijah dies, and is buried, 17, 18. Jeroboam dies, and is succeeded by Nadab, 19, 20. Rehoboam reigns over Judah; and they provoke the Lord by their wickedness, 21—24. Shishak carries away much treasure, and the golden shields, from Jerusalem, 25, 26. Rehoboam makes brazen shields in their stead, 27, 28. His acts, and wars with Jeroboam, 29, 30. He dies, and is succeeded by Abijam, 31.

AT [a] that time Abijah [b] the son of Jeroboam fell sick.

2 And Jeroboam said to his wife, Arise, I pray thee, and [c] disguise thyself, that thou be not known to be the wife of Jeroboam; and get thee to Shiloh: behold, there is [d] Ahijah the prophet, which told me that I should be king over this people.

3 And [e] take * with thee ten loaves, and † cracknels, and a ‡ cruse of honey, and go to him: [f] he shall tell thee what shall become of the child.

4 And Jeroboam's wife did so, and arose, and went to [g] Shiloh, and came to the house of Ahijah. But Ahijah could not see; [h] for his eyes § were set by reason of his age.

5 And [i] the LORD said unto Ahijah, Behold, the wife of Jeroboam cometh to ask a thing of thee for her son; for he is sick: thus and thus shalt thou say unto her: for it shall be, when she cometh in, that she shall feign herself to be another woman.

6 And it was so, when Ahijah heard the sound of her feet, as she came in at the door, that he said, Come in, [k] thou wife of Jeroboam; [l] why feignest thou thyself to be another? [m] for I am sent to thee with ‖ heavy tidings.

7 Go, tell Jeroboam, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, [n] Forasmuch as I exalted thee from among the people, and made thee prince over my people Israel, foretold men's bones should be burnt on Jeroboam's altar; 'Lay mine' (says he) 'close to his, and then they will not be disturbed;' and it was, accordingly, their security, as we find, 2 K. 23: 18. Sleeping and waking, living and dying, it is safe being in good company. No mention is made here of the inscription on the prophet's tomb; but it is spoken of 2 K. 23: 17. the epitaph on the prophet's grave preserved the remembrance of his prophecy, and was a standing testimony against the idolatries of Beth-el, which it would not have been, so remarkably, had he died and been buried elsewhere. The cities of Israel are here called cities of Samaria, though that name was not yet known; however the old prophet spake, the inspired historian wrote in the language of his own time.

V. The obstinacy of Jeroboam in his idolatry, v. 33. Various methods had been used to reclaim him, but neither threats nor signs, judgments nor mercies, wrought on him, so strangely was he wedded to his calves; he did not reform, no not his priesthood, but whoever would, he made priest, though ever so illiterate or immoral, and of what tribe soever; and this became sin, i. e. a snare first, and then a ruin, to Jeroboam's house, to cut it off, v. 34. Note, The diminution, disquiet, and desolation, of families, are the fruit of sin; he promised himself the calves would secure the crown to his family, but it proved they lost it. Those betray themselves, that think by any sin to support themselves.

CHAP. XIV. The kingdom being divided into that of Judah and that of Israel, we must, henceforward, in these books of Kings, expect and attend their separate history.

V. 1—6. Here we are told how God proceeded in his controversy with Jeroboam; when God judges, He will overcome; sinners shall either bend, or break, before Him.

I. His child fell sick, v. 1. probably his eldest son, heir-apparent to the crown; for at his death, all the kingdom mourned, v. 13. When sickness comes into our families, we should inquire whether there be not some particular sin, which the affliction is sent to convince us of, and reclaim us from.

II. He sent to inquire of Ahijah, what should become of the child, v. 2, 3. This sickness touched him in a tender part; such is the force of natural affection; our children are ourselves but once removed. By this instance, and that of Ahaziah, 2 K. 1: 2. and Ben-hadad, 2 K. 8: 8. it should seem, they had then such a foolish notion of fatality, as took them off from all use of means. It had been more pious, had he desired to know wherefore God contended with him, begged the prophet's prayers, and cast away his idols; then the child might have been restored; but most people would rather be told their fortune, than their faults or their duty.

Ahijah lived obscure and neglected in Shiloh, blind through age, yet still blessed with the visions of the Almighty, which need not bodily eyes, but are rather favored by the want of them, the eyes of the mind being then most intent, and least diverted: Jeroboam has recourse to him, now the gods he served could give him no relief; some have by sickness been reminded of their forgotten ministers, and praying friends: he sends to Ahijah, because he had told him he should be king, v. 2. Once the messenger of good tidings, surely he will be so again; those that by sin disqualify themselves for comfort, and yet expect their ministers, because good men, should speak peace and comfort to them, greatly wrong both themselves and their ministers.

He sent his wife, because she could best put the question without names, or any other description than, 'Sir, I have a son ill; will he recover, or not?' It seems there were none of all his counsellors, whom he could trust; otherwise, it had been much fitter for her to stay at home, to take care of the child. She must disguise herself from the prophet, that he might only answer her question concerning her son, and not enter on the unpleasing subject of her husband's defection; some people love to prescribe to their ministers, and care not to have the whole counsel of God declared to them, lest it prophesy no good concerning them, but evil. But what a strange notion of God's prophet, as though he could and would certainly tell what would become of the child, and yet either could not, or would not, discover the mother. Be not deceived, God is not mocked.

III. God gave Ahijah notice of her approach and disguise, and full instructions what to say, (v. 5.) which enabled him, as she came in, to call her by name, to her great surprise, and so discover her to all about him, v. 6. He had no regard to her rank, as queen, nor to her present; (v. 3.) he did not think himself obliged to give her any finer language than the nature of her message required. Nor did he regard her industrious concealment; it is a civility not to notice those who desire not to be noticed; but the prophet was no courtier; plain dealing is best, and she shall know, at the first word, what she has to trust to; I am sent to thee with heavy tidings.

V. 7—20. The prophet here prevents inquiry concerning the child, and foretells the ruin of Jeroboam's house for its wickedness; no one else durst have carried such a message, but his own wife cannot be suspected of ill-will to him.

I. God calls Himself the Lord God of Israel; He is Israel's God, therefore will take vengeance on him who did them the greatest mischief possible, drawing them away from Him.

II. He upbraids Jeroboam with his great favor, in taking the kingdom from the house of David, to bestow it on him. Whether we keep account of God's mercies or no, He does, and will set even them in order before us, if we be ungrateful, to our greater confusion; otherwise, He gives, and upbraids not.

III. He charges him with his impiety and apostasy, and his idolatry particularly, v. 9. Saul never worshipped idols; Solomon but occasionally, in his dotage, and he never made Israel to sin; but

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—4. In the remainder of the books of the Kings, we have the history of Judah and Israel carried on together, or with continual transitions from one to the other. But the latter part of 2 Chr. more fully relates the history of the kings of Judah, and drops that of the kings of Israel, except as connected with the other.—Jeroboam had not noticed Ahijah, either while taking possession of the kingdom, or when establishing his idolatrous worship at Dan and Beth-el; being conscious that the prophet would have opposed and condemned his whole conduct. But when his son was dangerously ill, he was convinced, that more dependence might be placed on his word, than on that of all his priests. SCOTT.

Verses 7—11.

(Notes, 11:29—38.)—Jeroboam intended his calves, at Dan and Beth-el, should represent the God of Israel, and would have his subjects think, they were worshipping the God of their fathers. (12:26—29.) But the Lord called them, 'other gods, and molten images;' for as He cannot be represented by any similitude, so He abhors all image-wor-gave it thee: and yet thou hast not been as [p] my servant David, who kept my commandments, and who followed me with all his heart, to do that only which was right in mine eyes;

9 But [q] hast done evil above all that were before thee: for [r] thou hast gone and made thee other gods, and molten images, [s] to provoke me to anger, and hast [t] cast me behind thy back:

10 Therefore, behold, [u] I will bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam, and will cut off from Jeroboam [x] him that pisseth against the wall, and [y] him that is shut up and left in Israel, and will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam, [z] as a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone.

11 Him [a] that dieth of Jeroboam in the city shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat: for the LORD hath spoken it.

12 Arise thou therefore, get thee to thine own house: and [b] when thy feet enter into the city, the child shall die.

13 And all Israel [c] shall mourn for him, and bury him: for he only of Jeroboam shall come to the grave, because in him [d] there is found some good thing toward the LORD God of Israel, in the house of Jeroboam.

14 Moreover [e] the LORD shall raise him up a king over Israel, who shall cut off the house of Jeroboam that day: [f] but what? even now.

15 For [g] the LORD shall smite Israel, [h] as a reed is shaken in the water; and he shall [i] root up Israel out of [k] this good land which he gave to their fathers, and [l] shall scatter them beyond the river; [m] because they have made their groves, [n] provoking the LORD to anger.

16 And [o] he shall give Israel up because of the sins of Jeroboam, [p] who did sin, and who made Israel to sin.

17 ¶ And Jeroboam's wife arose, and departed, and came to [q] Tirzah: and [r] when she came to the threshold of the door, the child died;

18 And they buried him; and all Israel mourned for him, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake by the hand of his servant Ahijah the prophet.

Jeroboam's calves, though pretended to be set up in honor of the God of Israel, yet are here called other gods, or strange gods, because in them he worshipped God, as the heathen their strange gods; changed the truth of God into a lie, and represented Him as altogether different from what He is; and because many of the ignorant worshippers terminated their devotion in the image, and did not at all regard the God of Israel. David though he had his faults, and some bad ones, yet never forsook the worship of God, nor grew loose or cold to that.

IV. He foretells the utter ruin of Jeroboam's house, v. 10, 11. God removed his family as a great dunghill. Noble, royal families, if wicked, are no better, in God's account. Their destruction was unusual and shameful: their very dead bodies should be meat for the dogs in the street, or the birds of prey in the field. Thus evil pursues sinners. See this fulfilled, ch. 15: 29.

V. He foretells the immediate death of the child now sick, v. 12, 13. 1. In mercy to him; lest, if he live, he be infected with the sin, and so involved in the ruin, of his father's house. Observe the character given of him, v. 13. He only had an affection for the true worship of God, and disliked the worship of the calves. Note, (1.) Those are good, in whom are good things toward the Lord God of Israel; good inclinations, intentions, desires. Where there is but some good thing of that kind, it will be found: God sees it, and is pleased with it. A little grace goes a great way with great people. It is so rare to find princes well affected to religion, that, when they are so, they are worthy of double honor. Pious dispositions are, in a peculiar manner, amiable and acceptable, when found in the young. The divine image, in miniature, has a peculiar beauty and lustre. Those that are good in bad times and places, shine very bright in the eyes of God. A good child in the house of Jeroboam, is a miracle of divine grace. Observe the care taken of him: he only, of all Jeroboam's family, shall die in honor; be buried, and lamented, as one that lived desired. Note, Persons distinguished by divine grace, shall be distinguished by divine providence. This hopeful child dies first of all the family; God often takes them soonest, whom He loves best. 2. In wrath to the family; it was a sign the family would be ruined, when he was taken, by whom it might have been reformed. The righteous are removed from the evil to come in this world, to the good to come in a better. It is a bad omen to a family, when the best in it are buried out of it. It is likewise a present affliction to the family and kingdom, by which both ought to have been bettered.

VI. He foretells the setting up of another family over Israel, v. 14. fulfilled in Baasha of Issachar, who, conspiring against Nadab the son of Jeroboam, in the second year of his reign, murdered him, and all his family. 'But what? Even now.' Sometimes God makes quick work with sinners He did so with the house of Jeroboam. It was not 24 years from his first elevation, to the final extirpation of his family.

VII. He foretells the judgments which should come on the people of Israel, for conforming to the worship Jeroboam had established. It is here foretold, (v. 15.) 1. That they should never be easy, nor rightly settled in their land, but continually shaken like a reed growing in running water. After they left the house of David, the government never continued long in one family, one undermined and destroyed another, and all was disturbance. 2. That they should, ere long, be totally expelled out of their good land, and ruined, v. 16. This was fulfilled, in the captivity of the ten tribes, by the king of Assyria. Families and kingdoms are ruined by the sin of the heads of them. Jeroboam did sin, and made Israel to sin. If great men do wickedly, they go to hell with a long train, and their condemnation will be more intolerable, who must answer not only for their own sins, but for the sins others have been drawn into, and kept in, by their influence.

The child died; (v. 17.) and Jeroboam himself soon after, v. 20. It is said, (2 Chr. 13: 20.) The Lord struck him with some sore disease, so that he died miserably, when he had reigned 22 years; and left his crown to a son, who lost it, and his life too, and all the lives of his family, within two years after. For a further account of him, the reader is referred to the annals of his reign, drawn up by his own secretaries or the public records, called here, The book, or register, ship as gross idolatry. The case is precisely the same, as to the worship of images in the church of Rome. (2 Chr. 11:13—17.) Some of the terms used here occur for the first time. (M. R. x, y.—1 Sam. 25: 21, 22, v. 22.)—By 'him that is shut up and left in Israel,' may be meant, 'every one who has taken refuge in the most fortified cities, and every one that has escaped from the more general devastations:' or, in general, all without exception, however secure they might suppose themselves to be; even these would be pursued and cut off. Or, an allusion may be made to those peculiar treasures, which are shut up for security in the safest repositories, and are reserved to the last when all else is spent; and yet they must be parted with, or will be searched out and seized upon. Indeed the house of Jeroboam was become as offensive to the Lord, as dung would be in a man's habitation; and should therefore be taken away till there was none left. Verses 15, 16.

These vs. emphatically predict the enfeebled, distracted state of Israel, by continual usurpations, massacres, and civil wars, and the further idolatries into which they were led by their wicked princes, until they were given up finally at the Assyrian captivity.—They were punished for 'willingly walking after the commandment' of Jeroboam, to worship the golden calves; and for concurring in his revolt from the house of David, and from the worship of God. 19 And the rest of the acts of Jeroboam, [a] how he warred, and how he reigned, behold, they are written [t] in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel.

B. C. 954. 20 And the days which Jeroboam reigned were two and twenty years: [u] and he * slept with his fathers, and [x] Nadab his son reigned in his stead.

[Practical Observations.]

B. C. 975. ¶ 21 And Rehoboam the son of Solomon reigned in Judah. [y] Rehoboam was forty and one years old when he began to reign, and he reigned seventeen years in Jerusalem, [z] the city which the LORD did choose out of all the tribes of Israel, [a] to put his name there. And his mother's name was [b] Naamah an Ammonitess.

22 And [c] Judah did evil in the sight of the LORD, and [d] they provoked him to jealousy with their sins which they had committed, [e] above all that their fathers had done.

23 For they also [f] built them high places, and † images, and [g] groves, on every high hill, and under every green tree.

24 And [h] there were also Sodomites in the land: and they did according to all the abominations of the nations, which the LORD cast out before the children of Israel.

25 And it came to pass in the fifth year of king Rehoboam, that [i] Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem:

of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel, which not being divinely inspired, are long since lost.

V. 21—31. Judah's story and Israel's are intermixed in this book. Jeroboam outlived Rehoboam four or five years, yet his history is despatched first, that the account of Rehoboam's reign may be laid together; and a sad account it is. He was born in the last year of David, and had his education, and the forming of his mind, in the best days of Solomon; yet Solomon's defection, at last, did more to corrupt him, than his wisdom and devotion had done to give him good principles. He reigned 17 years in Jerusalem, the city where God put his name, where he had opportunity enough to know his duty, if he had had but a heart to do it. His mother was an Ammonitess, twice mentioned, v. 21, 31. Strange, David would marry Solomon to an Ammonitess, (for it was done while he lived,) but, probably, Solomon loved her, because she was Naamah, a beauty, so it signifies, and his father was loath to cross him, but it proved to have a very bad influence upon posterity. None can imagine how lasting and how fatal the consequences may be, of being unequally yoked with unbelievers, [or with those whose propensities overbalance their moral sentiments.] He had continual war with Jeroboam, (v. 30.) which could not but be a perpetual uneasiness. When he had reigned but 17 years, he died, and left his throne to his son.

Here is much said to the disadvantage of the subjects, both as to their character and their condition.

I. How wicked and profane they were: a most sad account is here given of their apostasy, v. 22—24. Judah, the only professing people God had in the world, did evil in his sight, in contempt and defiance of Him, and the tokens of his special presence with them. The magnificence of their temple, the pomp of their priesthood, and all the secular advantages which attended their religion, could not keep them to it; nothing less than the pouring out of the Spirit from on high, will keep God's Israel in their allegiance to Him. The account here given of the wickedness of the Jews, agrees with that which the apostle gives of the wickedness of the Gentile world; (Rom. 1: 21, 24.) so both Jew and Gentile are all alike under

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20. Parents often suffer and are corrected in the affliction of their children: but sinners are more anxious to know the secret purposes of God, than to understand his revealed will and their own duty: and they are often conscious, that their forms are not to be depended on; but are afraid that others should perceive their convictions, and despise them. They secretly reverence the faithful servants of God: and, having found the truth of some of their words, they have an inward persuasion, that the rest also will be verified; except as they flatter themselves with hopes of escaping the miseries denounced against them. They form, indeed, very erroneous judgments both of God and of his servants; yet they would be glad of help or information in times of trouble, did they not fear rebukes and warnings. They, therefore, either keep at a distance, or attempt to impose on faithful ministers, by disguising their real characters, and pretending kindness to them. Indeed the wisest of men may thus be deceived; but God searches every heart, and often unmasks the hypocrite before the world: He more frequently enables his servants to see through their disguises, and to address them in their real, not their assumed characters; and at last He will expose them to universal shame and contempt before the assembled world.—Every providential favor demands a return of grateful obedience, and aggravates future transgression; and thus prosperous sinners accumulate guilt and wrath, with a rapidity proportioned to their abused mercies. (Rom. 2:4—6.)—When men have witnessed, and have even gained by, the wrath of God against the sins of other men, and yet imitate and exceed them in iniquity; they may expect to be visited with more tremendous vengeance: and as they dishonor Him by their crimes, He will disgrace them in their punishment.—A man is not indeed affected by the indignity shown to his dead body, or even by the miseries of his posterity; yet the prospect may torment his mind while he lives: such judgments form a proper emblem of the punishment of the wicked after death; and they strongly express the abhorrence and indignation of God for a warning to others.—The Lord deals with men according to their habitual character: and He will not mention against the upright believer, who has cordially followed Him, those incidental sins of which he has repented, and for which he has patiently borne correction.—To show the power and sovereignty of his grace, He frequently reserves an individual or two out of the worst of families, in whom there is 'some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel.' The fruits of his grace He peculiarly delights in, when they flourish from the hearts of the young and the affluent, and of those who are surrounded with contagious examples and instruction. SCOTT.

(M. R.) The book, &c. (19) These chronicles, or words of days, or journals, were the public records of the kingdom, from which extracts seem to have been made by the inspired writers, with such additions as were suited for instruction. 'The book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah,' (29) were the records of that kingdom, and not that part of holy writ, which we call the Books of Chronicles. (M. R.—11:41. 1 Chr. 29:29, 30.) Verse 21.

David had himself married the daughter of Talmai, the king of Geshur; but the character of Absalom, his son by her, should have cautioned him against such marriages. (2 Sam. 3 2—5. 13:37—39. 15:—17:) It is very doubtful whether Naamah ever cordially embraced true religion: and as Solomon worshipped the gods of Ammon among the rest, it has been thought, she at last became one of his seducers. (3:1. 11:1—8.) ID.

It was a most extraordinary circumstance, that, after the priests and Levites, and pious persons from Israel, had settled in Judah, (2 Chr. 11:13—17. 12:1.) Rehoboam and his subjects in general should become more gross idolaters, than the Israelites were. Yet this was actually the case: for they worshipped false gods even more directly than the Israelites; and the groves seem to have been temples erected in shady places, where the most abominable lewdness was practised in honor of their filthy idols. (M. R.—9—11. 12.26—29. Lev. 18:21—30.) SCOTT.

We see that this name, also found on many other monuments, is strictly the same with that of Sesogchis (pronounced Sesonchis) preserved by Manetho, and differs from it only by the addition of a Greek termination. But if one has the slightest notion of the particular genius of the Shemitish languages, which, adhering only to the skeletons of words, i. e. the consonants, neglect the vowels, as least important, he will then be struck with the analogy of the Egyptian name, Shshnk, to that of the Heb. written Shyshy (Shishak or Sheshok). Indeed one cannot but perceive their identity: [and so Usher, who] puts this invasion in 971

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 21—31. No wonder they, who live at a distance from the ordinances of God, are hardened in iniquity; when such as are most favored provoke Him to jealousy by their crimes, and are uninfluenced by his judgments, mercies, warnings, and promises. —The perpetration of the worst crimes, of the worst of the heathen, in Jerusalem, the city that the Lord had chosen for his temple and worship; and at present in this favored land; demonstrates, that nothing can render the heart of fallen man holy, but the special, sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit: on this alone may we depend; for this may we daily pray, in behalf of ourselves and of all around us!—But sin quickly enfeebles, impoverishes, and disgraces the most prosperous nations: and when holiness, the real glory of a religious profession, is gone, all external splendor will follow it, or become worthless. Yet many, who live in gross wickedness, keep up a formal attendance on divine ordinances, and are pleased with an ostentatious imitation of the usages of better times; which have lost all their intrinsic value, and retain nothing, except the external glitter that amuses weak and carnal minds. Verse 5.

Save only, &c.] Those who know the human heart, and the state of a believer in this world of conflict and temptation, will never expect to see in mere man a character and conduct free from blemish and criminality; though they observe many preserved from falling, or from continuing long under the power of notorious evils. David deeply repented, and to the close of his life showed himself to be the upright and devoted servant and worshipper of the Lord, and in no instance turned aside to idolatry, or countenanced it in his subjects. Verse 9.

Abijam began to reign during the 18th year of Jeroboam; reigned through his 19th year, and died before the close of his 20. Thus, Abijam is said, according to the Hebrew idiom, to have reigned 'three years,' in the same manner as Christ is said to have risen after 'three days.' Thus also Nadab began to reign in the second year of Asa, and reigned two years: yet Baasha succeeded him in the third year of Asa. (28) This is the way, in which the computation of the years between the two kingdoms may be made to coincide: for, in the numerous successions in the kingdom of Israel, the same year is frequently twice reckoned; both to him who reigned in its commencement, and to him who succeeded before the close of it. him, weakened him, and compelled him to be quiet the rest of his reign, 2 Chr. 13: 20.

But, in general, we are told, (1.) He was not like David, had no hearty affection for God's ordinances; though, to serve his purpose against Jeroboam, he pleaded possession of the temple and priesthood, as what he valued himself upon, 2 Chr. 13: 10—12. Many boast of their profession of godliness, who are strangers to its power; and plead the truth of their religion, who yet are not true to it. His heart was not perfect with the Lord his God; he seemed to have zeal, but wanted sincerity; he began well, but fell off, and walked in all the sins of his father, though he had seen the bad consequences. He that was all his days in war, ought to have been so wise as to make and keep peace with God, especially having found Him so good a Friend in his war with Jeroboam, 2 Chr. 13: 18. Let favor be showed the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness, Isa. 26: 10. (2.) Yet it was for David's sake he was advanced to, and continued on, the throne, (v. 4, 5.) not for his own sake, or for the sake of his father, whose steps he trod in. Note, It aggravates the sin of a degenerate seed, that they fare the better for their ancestor's piety, owe their blessings to it, yet will not imitate it: but unreasonably ridicule and oppose that of which they enjoy the benefit. The character here given of David, is very great, that he did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord; but the exception very remarkable, save only in the matter of Uriah, including both his murder, and the debauching of his wife. That was a bad matter; it was a remaining blot on his name, a bar in his escutcheon, and its reproach not wiped away, though its guilt was. David was guilty of other faults, but they were nothing in comparison of that: yet that, repented of, though mentioned for warning to others, did not prevail to throw him out of the covenant, nor to cut off the entail of the promise upon his seed.

V. 9—24. We have here a short account of the reign of Asa; we shall find a more copious one, 2 Chr. 14, 15, and 16.

Here is, I. The length of it, 41 years, v. 10. In the account we have of the kings of Judah, we find the number of the good and bad kings nearly equal; but the reign of the good kings was generally long, that of the bad, short; the consideration of which will make the state of God's church not altogether so bad, within that period, as it appears, at first sight. Length of days is in Wisdom's right hand. Honor thy father, much more thy heavenly Father, that thy days may be long.

II. The general good character of it, v. 11. That is right indeed, which is so in God's eyes. Those are approved, whom He commends. He did as did David his father, kept close to God, and to his instituted worship, though he was not a prophet, or psalmist. If we come up to the graces of those that are gone before us, it will be our praise with God, though we come short of their gifts. Asa was like David, though neither such a conqueror, nor such an author; his heart was perfect with the Lord all his days, (v. 14.) i. e. he was both cordial and constant in his religion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. Even a superficial acquaintance with the divine law may enable us to perceive evident defects in the conduct of eminent believers; yet if the habitual conduct of the righteous be impartially contrasted with that of unbelievers, the difference is very visible, and they appear to be of another spirit, and far more excellent than their neighbors. The general conduct of the Lord's servants may therefore be held forth as an example for imitation: and numbers are blessed on their account, both while they live, and after they are gone to their rest. But alas! even children, who have been favored and spared for their parents' sake, often forsake their righteous ways; and but few, especially in superior stations, or among kings and rulers, have hitherto served God in uprightness of heart.—It is happy for nations, when wicked rulers are speedily removed; and when the righteous come in their stead, and are long preserved, 'to do that which is right in the eyes of the LORD.'—Those who would please Him, and promote reformation, must prefer his glory to the reputation of every friend or relative: nay, they must oppose the crimes even of their own parents, though this may seem a reflection on the memory of the deceased, or a slight put on the characters of the living. Nor may any age, sex, or relative tie, induce such as are intrusted with authority, to allow those to possess power or influence, who abuse it to the dishonor of God, and to promote idolatry, superstition, or ungodliness; and in every situation our duty to Him must have the precedency over all other duties. (Matt. 10: 37—39. Luke 14: 25—27.) How absurd then is it, to be satisfied with a religion, merely because our fathers professed it! for, indeed, that reason, if allowed to be valid, would generally prove that men ought to continue in idolatry, superstition, and immorality. (P. O. 1 Pet. 1: 17—21.)—Every reformation on earth has hitherto been defective: the utmost attainment of fallen man has been an upright and persevering endeavor to glorify God; and this meets with his merciful acceptance, by faith in Jesus Christ.

SCOTT.

Verse 13.

In a grove.] Note, Judg. 3:7. 'The temples of the Hindoos are nearly always connected with a grove, or sacred tree, and some of them are built under the branches of a single tree. Thus may be seen the noble banyan, (Ficus Indica,) with his giant arms and self-planted supporters, overshadowing the temple of superstition. The Vulg. makes this grove sacred to Priapus. The courtesans of the Hindoo temples are called "parrots of the groves."' ROBERTS.

Verse 14.

Was perfect, &c.] This may be opposed to the external good behavior, and the insincere and divided heart, of hypocrites; and may signify, that Asa was cordially devoted to the service and worship of God all his days; and that his sins arose from infirmity, not from presumptuous, deliberate wickedness. (5, 17—24. 2 Chr. 16: Ps. 19:12—14.) But some explain it to mean no more, than that he never turned aside from the worship of God to idolatry, as Solomon had done.

Verses 16—22.

(25—31.) The conduct of Asa evidently arose from unbelief, and was very criminal in itself.—Baasha's policy was not unlike the impious devices of Jeroboam: (12:26—29.) but God could have turned it

19 There is a [i] league between me and thee, and between my father and thy father: behold, I have sent unto thee a present of silver and gold; come and [k] break thy league with Baasha king of Israel, that he may * depart from me.

22 Then king Asa [r] made a proclamation throughout all Judah; none was †exempted: and they took away the stones of Ramah, and the timber thereof, wherewith Baasha had builded: and king Asa built with them [s] Geba of Benjamin, and [t] Mizpah.

32 And [k] there was war between Asa and Baasha king of Israel all their days.

33 In the third year

III. The particular instances of Asa's piety. His times were times of reformation. 1. He removed that which was evil. Though he began to reign but 20 years after the death of Solomon, yet very gross corruption had spread far, and taken deep root. Immorality he first struck at; he took away the Sodomites out of the land, suppressed the brothels; for how can either prince or people prosper, while those cages of unclean and filthy birds, more dangerous than pest-houses, are suffered to remain. Then he proceeded against idolatry, v. 12. His father having made idols, he was the more concerned to remove them, that he might cut off the entail of the curse, and prevent the visiting of that iniquity on him and his. Nay, when he found idolatry in the court, he rooted it out thence, v. 13. Maachah his grandmother, but called his mother, because she had the education of him in his childhood, had yet an idol in a grove, though she was his mother. Reformation must begin at home. Bad practices will never be suppressed in the country, while they are supported in the court. Asa, in every thing else, will honor and respect his mother; he loves her well, but he loves God better, and, like the Levite, (Deut. 33: 9.) bravely forgets the relation, when it comes in competition with his duty. If she be an idolater, her idol shall be burnt; and, probably, he strewed the ashes, in imitation of Moses, (Ex. 32: 20.) and in token of his detestation of idolatry, and his indignation at it, wherever he found it. She also shall be deposed from being queen, or from the queen: i. e. from conversing with his wife; he banished her the court, and confined her to an obscure and private life. They that have power, are happy, when thus they have hearts to use it well. 2. He re-established that which was good, v. 15. We must not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well; not only cast away the idols of our iniquity, but dedicate ourselves and our all to God's honor and glory. When those who, in their infancy, were, by baptism, devoted to God, make it their own act to join themselves to Him, and vigorously employ themselves in his service, that is bringing in the dedicated things they and their fathers have dedicated: it is necessary justice, rendering to God the things that are his.

IV. His political conduct. He built cities to encourage the increase of his people, (v. 23.) and to invite others to him by conveniences of habitation. And he was zealous to hinder Baasha from building [i. e. fortifying] Ramah, because he designed it to cut off communication between his people and Jerusalem, and to hinder those who, in obedience to God, would come to worship there. An enemy must by no means be suffered to fortify a frontier town.

V. The faults of his reign. In both the things for which he was praised, he was found defective; the fairest characters are not without some but or other in them. 1. Did he take away the idols? That was well: but the high places were not removed; (v. 14.) therein his reformation fell short. They were against the law, which obliged them to worship at one place, Deut. 12: 11. They lessened men's esteem of the temple and its altars, and were an open gap for idolatry to enter at, while the people were so much addicted to it. It was not well that Asa, when his hand was in, did not remove these; nevertheless his heart was perfect with the Lord. This affords us a comfortable note, that those may be found honest and upright with God, and be accepted of Him, who yet, in some instances, come short of doing the good they might and should. The perfection which is made the indispensable condition of the new covenant, is not to be understood of sinlessness, (then we were all undone,) but sincerity. 2. Did he bring in the dedicated things? That was well: but he afterward alienated them, when he took them to bribe Ben-hadad, to break his league with Baasha, and, by making an inroad on his country, to divert him from building Ramah, v. 18, 19. Here he sinned. If Ben-hadad did wrong to break his league, as certainly he did, Asa did wrong in persuading him to do it. He did wrong that he could not trust God, who had done so much for him, to free him out of this strait, without his using such indirect means to help himself: so in taking the gold out of the treasury of the temple, which was not to be used, but on extraordinary occasions. The project succeeded, v. 20—22. but we find it was displeasing to God; and though Asa valued himself on the policy of it, and promised himself it would effectually secure his peace, he is told by a prophet, that he had done foolishly, and that from thenceforth he should have wars; see 2 Chr. 16: 7—9. [and we find it began that foreign interference, ever after so disastrous to the state.]

VI. The troubles of his reign. For the most part, he prospered: but, 1. Baasha king of Israel was a very troublesome neighbor. He reigned 24 years, and, all his days, had war, more or less, with Asa, v. 16. This was the effect of the division of the kingdoms; they were continually vexing one another, which made them both an easier prey to the common enemy. 2. In his old age, too, he was himself afflicted with the gout.

VII. The conclusion of his reign. The acts of it were more largely recorded in the common history (to which reference is here had, v. 23.) than in this sacred one. He reigned long, but finished,

Verses 29, 30.

No doubt Baasha left the dead bodies of Jeroboam's family unburied, as it had been predicted. (14:9—14.) It is also referred to as a well-known fact in subsequent passages. (16:3, 4. 21:22—24.) Baasha, however, only sought to secure himself in the kingdom by this cruelty, and therefore imitated Jeroboam in his idolatry, and other impieties. (34. 16:2—7.) SCOTT.

of Asa king of Judah began Baasha the son of Ahijah to reign over all Israel in Tirzah, [l] twenty and four years.

CHAP. XVI.

Jehu the prophet predicts the ruin of Baasha's family, 1—4. Baasha dies, and is succeeded by his son Elah, 5—7. Zimri slays Elah, succeeds him, and fulfils Jehu's prophecy, 8—14. Omri usurps the kingdom, and besieges Zimri in Tirzah, who burns himself in the palace, 15—20. Tibni opposes Omri, who prevails against him, 21, 22. Omri builds Samaria, reigns very wickedly, dies, and is succeeded by Ahab, 23—28. Ahab's excessive wickedness and idolatry, as instigated by his wife Jezebel, 29—33. Joshua's curse on him that should rebuild Jericho, is fulfilled on Hiel, 34.

THEN the word of the LORD came to [a] Jehu the son of [b] Hanani against Baasha, saying,

2 Forasmuch as [c] I exalted thee out of the dust, and made thee prince over my people Israel, and [d] thou hast walked [e] in the way of Jeroboam, and [f] hast made my people Israel to sin, to provoke me to anger with their sins;

3 Behold, I will take away the posterity of Baasha, and the posterity of his house; and [g] will make thy house like the house of Jeroboam the son of Nebat.

4 Him that dieth of Baasha in the city [h] shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth of his in the field shall the fowls of the air eat.

5 Now [i] the rest of the acts of Baasha, and what he did, and his might, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel?

awhile, as Jeroboam was; 24 years he reigned, (v. 33.) but showed it was not from any dislike to Jeroboam's sins, that he destroyed his family, but from malice and ambition; for, when he had rooted out the sinner, he himself clave to the sin, and walked in the way of Jeroboam, (v. 34.) though he had seen the end of that way; so strangely was his heart hardened with sin's deceitfulness.

CHAP. XVI. This ch. relates wholly to the kingdom of Israel, and the revolutions of that kingdom—many in a little time.

V. 1—14. Here is, I. The ruin of the family of Baasha foretold: he was a man likely enough to raise and establish his family, active, politic, and daring; but his idolatry brought destruction on it. God sent him warning, 1. That if he were thereby wrought upon to repent and reform, the ruin might be prevented. 2. That, if not, it might appear that the destruction, when it did come, whoever might be instruments of it, was the act of God's justice, and the punishment of sin. Hanani, the father, was a seer, or prophet, at the same time with Jehu, 2 Chr. 16: 7. He was sent to Asa king of Judah; but the son, on this longer and more dangerous expedition to Baasha king of Israel. Prophecy, thus happily entailed, was worthy of so much the more honor. This Jehu continued long in his usefulness; we find him reproving Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. 19: 2.) above 40 years after, and writing the annals of that prince, 2 Chr. 20: 34. The message he brought to Baasha, is much the same with that which Ahijah sent to Jeroboam by his wife. (1.) He reminds him of the great things God had done for him, v. 2. Baasha seemed to have raised himself by his own treachery and cruelty, yet there was the hand of Providence in it, to bring about God's counsel, concerning Jeroboam's house; God's owning his advancement as his act and deed, by no means amounts to the patronising of his ambition and treachery. God puts power into bad men's hands, but makes it serve his good purposes, notwithstanding their bad use of it. God calls Israel his people still, though wretchedly corrupted, because they retained the covenant of circumcision, and there were many good people among them. (2.) He charges him with high crimes and misdemeanors. [1.] That he had made Israel to sin, seduced God's subjects from their allegiance, and brought them to pay the homage, due to Him only, at last, with honor, and left his throne to a successor no way inferior to himself.

V. 25—34. We are now to view the miserable condition of Israel, while the kingdom of Judah was happy under Asa's good government. It was threatened, they should be as a reed shaken in the water; (ch. 14: 15.) and so they were, when, during the single reign of Asa, the government of the kingdom was in six or seven different hands, in Jeroboam's in the beginning of his reign, and Ahab's at the end of it; between whom were Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri, undermining and destroying one another. This they got by deserting the house both of God and of David.

Here is, 1. The ruin and extirpation of the family of Jeroboam, according to the word of the Lord by Ahijah. His son Nadab succeeded him. If the death of his brother Abijah had had a due influence on him, to make him religious, and the honor done him at his death had engaged him to follow his good example, his reign might have been long and glorious; but he walked in the way of his father, (v. 26.) kept up the worship of his calves, and forbade his subjects to go up to Jerusalem to worship; sinned, and made Israel to sin; therefore God brought ruin on him quickly, in the second year of his reign. He was besieging Gibbethon, a city which the Philistines had taken from the Danites, and was endeavoring to retake it; and there, in the midst of his army, did Baasha, with others, conspire against him, and kill him; (v. 27.) and so little interest had he in the affections of his people, that his army did not only not avenge his death, but chose his murderer for his successor. From what motive, does not appear; but Baasha slew him, and reigned in his stead, v. 28. And the first thing he did, when he came to the crown, was, to cut off all the house of Jeroboam, that he might the better secure himself, and his own usurped government. He thought it not enough to imprison or banish them, but he destroyed them; left not only no males, (as was foretold, ch. 14: 10.) but none that breathed. Herein, he was barbarous, but God was righteous. Jeroboam's sin was punished, (v. 30.) for they that provoke God, do it to their own confusion; see Jer. 7: 19. Ahijah's prophecy was accomplished, v. 29. Divine threatenings are not designed merely to terrify.

2. The elevation of Baasha. He shall be tried awhile, as Jeroboam was; 24 years he reigned, (v. 33.) but showed it was not from any dislike to Jeroboam's sins, that he destroyed his family, but from malice and ambition; for, when he had rooted out the sinner, he himself clave to the sin, and walked in the way of Jeroboam, (v. 34.) though he had seen the end of that way; so strangely was his heart hardened with sin's deceitfulness.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—34. Even true believers find it very difficult, in times of urgent danger, 'to trust in the LORD with all their heart, and not to lean to their own understanding:' and unbelief proportionably makes way for carnal policy.—How much happier are those who are connected with godly people, than such as have their lot cast among the profane and wicked! (16: 21, 22.)—Wretched is it for others, but most so for themselves, when children inherit the vices, with the estates, of their wicked parents: their temporal calamities may arise from the sins of their fathers; but 'the wrath to come' will be the recompense of their own crimes.—Ungodly men execute the just judgment of God on each other, whilst gratifying their own ambition, avarice, or revenge; and at the same time they ripen for severer vengeance, by imitating the sins of those whom they have supplanted.—Many suffer, and many are induced to commit iniquity, by such rulers and usurpers. But in the midst of all these enormities, and this apparent confusion, the Lord is carrying on his universal plan: and when it shall be fully completed, all rational and holy creatures, and all the company of redeemed sinners, will perceive, admire, and adore the glorious justice, wisdom, truth, and mercy, displayed in every part of it, through all the ages of eternity! PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. We do not well understand the rules, and plans of wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy, by which God governs nations and individuals; (Note, Ps. 97: 2.) yet we may draw general instructive conclusions from this history. Frequently the Lord warns before He punishes: and they, who are not induced to repentance, are rendered more inexcusable in their wickedness.—God is greatly displeased with those who in any way tempt others to commit iniquity: but He is especially provoked by those, who seduce his professing people to apostasy, or true believers to conceal or disgrace their profession: persecutors, therefore, will be answerable for all the sins, to which they tempt men by the dread of punishment, as well as for all the injustice which they commit, and the blood which they shed.—Those who follow the examples of such as have been awfully punished for their sins, may expect to be overtaken with similar vengeance.—The impunity of the principal culprits, while their children, relatives, or helpers suffer for their crimes, loudly declares the approaching day of judgment, and the more exact discrimination of characters, and distribution of rewards and punishments, which shall then take place.

I. How he reigned, when, at length, settled on the throne. 1. He made himself famous by building Samaria, (ever after, the royal city of the kings of Israel, the palace at Tirzah being burnt,) which, in process of time, grew so considerable, that it gave name to the middle part of Canaan, between Galilee on the N. and Judea on the S. and to the inhabitants of that country, who were called Samaritans. He bought the ground for somewhat more than 700 pounds, sterling money, a talent was 353*l.* 11*s.* 10½*d.* Perhaps, Shemer sold it cheaper, on condition the city should be called after his name, which, otherwise, would have borne the name of the purchaser; Samaria is Shemeren, in the Hebrew. The kings of Israel changed their royal seats; Shechem first, then Tirzah, now Samaria; but the kings of Judah were constant to Jerusalem, the city of God: they that cleave to the Lord, fix; they that leave Him, ever wander. 2. He made himself infamous, v. 25. Though brought to the throne with much difficulty, and remarkably favored in his advancement by Providence, yet he was more profane, or more superstitious, and a greater persecutor, than either of the houses of Jeroboam or Baasha; he went further in establishing iniquity by a law, and forcing his subjects to comply; for we read of the statutes of Omri, the keeping of which made Israel a desolation, Mic. 6: 16. Jeroboam made Israel to sin, by temptation, example, and allurement; but Omri, by compulsion.

V. 29—34. We have the beginning of the reign of Ahab, of whom more is recorded, than of any of the kings of Israel; we have here only a general idea of him, that we may expect what the particulars will be; he reigned 22 years, long enough to do a deal of mischief.

I. He exceeded all his predecessors in wickedness, v. 30. and, as if it were done with a particular enmity both to God and Israel, it is said, He did more, purposely to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger, and, consequently, to send judgments on his land, than all the kings of Israel before him, v. 33. He thought it a light thing to walk in the sins of Jeroboam, v. 31. It was nothing to break the second commandment by image-worship, he would set aside the first also by introducing other gods. Making light of lesser sins makes way for greater; and they that endeavor to extenuate other people's sins will but aggravate their own.

II. He married a wicked woman, who, he knew, would bring in the worship of Baal, and seemed to marry her with that design, v. 31. She was a zealous idolater, extremely imperious and malicious in her natural temper, addicted to witch-

The war lasted six years, (Note, 23.) before the contest ended with he death of Tibni. ID.

So Tibni, &c. (22) How much is contained in this concise sentence! and similar contests continually terminate in the same manner. It is an epitome especially of the history of civil wars. SCOTT. Alas, the insignificance of party politics! How briefly is this revolution, which sundered a whole people into hostile parties, recorded, while on many scenes of domestic life the Scriptures are so copious. The engrossing nature, however, of such ephemeral revolutions, so little conducive to the great end of existence, is well exhibited in the Reflections of the justly eminent ld. chief justice HALE, on the restoration of Ch. II. of Engl. 'When we should be praying,' says he, 'or reading, or observing the duty of the day, or thinking on our everlasting concernments, the thoughts of occurrences past, or what will be next, or what is fit to be said or done, in order to present transactions, interpose, and steal away our hearts, . . . leaving little for God but a bare shell or carcass of devotion, without a life or soul—stifling, starving and diverting those considerations which are of most absolute necessity for our Christian walk.'—See his Life, by Dr. WILLIAMS, of Shrewsbury; p. 53, &c. ED.

Verse 23.

Twelve, &c.] Twelve years elapsed from the death of Zimri to tha of Omri; namely, from the beginning of the 27th, to the end of the 38th year of Asa's reign. But, probably, half that time had been spent in civil wars, between Omri and Tibni; and the 31st year of Asa was nearly concluded, when Omri obtained the undisputed possession of the throne; from which time he reigned six complete years.—Thus, whilst Israel was torn to pieces by intestine commotions, conspiracies, massacres, and the succession of one usurper to another, who were all monsters of iniquity, and each destroyed the families, friends, and adherents of the murdered king; Judah was quietly governed by one pious prince, who began to reign in the days of Jeroboam, survived Nadab Baasha, Elah, Zimri, and Omri, and lived till the 4th year of Ahab The revolt of Israel therefore proved to be mainly their own loss (12:16.) SCOTT.

Verse 24.

It is probable, the burning of the palace at Tirzah, by Zimri, induced Omri to this measure.—From this city the whole surrounding country was called Samaria, or Shomeron: and sometimes the whole kingdom of the ten tribes is thus called, after Samaria became the capital city. (M. R.) ID.

30 And Ahab the son of Omri did evil in the sight of the LORD [o] above all that were before him.

31 And it came to pass, [*] as if it had been [p] a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, that he [q] took to wife [r] Jezebel the daughter of Ethbaal king of [s] the Zidonians, [t] and went and [u] served Baal, and worshipped him.

32 And he reared up an altar for Baal in [x] the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria.

33 And Ahab [y] made a grove; and Ahab [z] did more to provoke the LORD God of Israel to anger, than all the kings of Israel that were before him.

34 In his days did Hiel the Beth-elite build Jericho: he laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his first-born, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, [a] according to the word of the LORD, which he spake by Joshua the son of Nun.

crafts and whoredoms, (2 K. 9: 22.) and every way vicious. The false prophetess spoken of, Rev. 2: 20. is called Jezebel; a wicked woman could not be called by a worse name: what mischiefs she did, and what mischief, at last, befell her, (2 K. 9: 33.) we shall find in the following story; this one strange wife debauched Israel more than all Solomon's.

III. He set up the worship of Baal, the god of the Zidonians, Jupiter instead of Jehovah; the sun, so some think; a deified hero of the Phenicians, so others: he was weary of the golden calves, and, like adulterers, must have variety. In honor of this mock deity, he built a temple in Samaria, the royal city, because the temple of God was in Jerusalem, the royal city of the other kingdom; he would have Baal's temple near him, that he might the better frequent, protect, and honor it. He reared an altar in that temple, on which to offer sacrifice to Baal, by which they acknowledged their dependence on him, and sought his favor. O the stupidity of idolaters! He made a grove about his temple, [note, 15:13.] either a natural one, or, (as it is not said, He planted, but, He made a grove,) something that answered the intention, which was to conceal, and so, countenance, the abominable impurities committed in the filthy worship of Baal. He that doeth evil, hateth the light.

IV. One of his subjects, in imitation of his presumption, ventured to build Jericho, in defiance of the curse Joshua long since pronounced on him that should attempt it, v. 34. It comes in as an instance of the height of impiety men were then arrived at, especially at Beth-el, where was one of the calves, for of that city this daring sinner was. He began to build, in defiance of the curse well known in Israel, jesting with it, perhaps, as a bugbear, or fancying it was worn out by length of time, now above 500 years, Josh. 6: 26. He built for his children, but God wrote him childless; his eldest son died, when he began, the youngest, when he finished, and all the rest, (it is supposed,) between. Note, Those whom God curses, are cursed indeed; none ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered. God keep us back from presumptuous sins, those great transgressions!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—24. Wicked men accomplish the purposes of God without intending it; and their injustice and cruelty towards each other display his righteousness, while they illustrate the desperate wickedness of the heart of man.—When they are hurried on by their vile passions, and have got the power into their hands, they often perpetrate much wickedness in a little time: and thus they speedily fill up their measure, and hasten the vengeance of God upon themselves. Whether they destroy themselves, or are murdered by others, the ruin is brought upon them by sinning against the Lord: even in death they frequently show the predominancy of their pride, envy, and malice; and thus are driven away into the eternal world, not only under condemnation as sinners, but under the domineering power of most diabolical dispositions, being 'vessels of wrath fitted for destruction.' From such a death, good Lord, deliver us!—The progress of iniquity must be from bad to worse; it seems a light thing to notorious sinners to walk in the steps of their predecessors; and they are often ambitious of distinguishing themselves, and of expressing their enmity and contempt of God, in ways before unheard of. Hence so many newly invented oaths, blasphemies, superstitions, and species of false religion; as well as new refinements in licentiousness and immorality.—When princes set the example of rebellion against God, their subjects will often ambitiously emulate them, and thus ungodliness becomes a test of loyalty, and a kind of fashionable accomplishment: nor will any warnings daunt the stout spirits of presumptuous sinners, till wrath come upon them to the uttermost. But they, who despise the denunciations of God's word, will certainly know his truth in them by their own dreadful experience. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1. The most illustrious prophet Elijah was raised up, in the reign of the most wicked among the kings of Israel. 'Tishbite.' It is not agreed, whether this title was taken from the place where he lived; or given him because he was the reformer of Israel: for the word may signify a converter. It may be supposed, Elijah had previously warned Ahab to forsake his idolatry, and that he had treated his message with contempt.—The duration of this drought was three years and a half; and the effects must have been inexpressibly calamitous. (M. R. c.) One whole year, without rain or dew, would afflict this land, more terribly than it can be conceived: but in much less than three years and a half nearly all the cattle must be destroyed, and most of the inhabitants would be either dead or migrated into other countries. Yet the bulk of Israel continued mad upon their idols, throughout this most tremendous calamity! It was sent in answer to the prophet's prayer, which probably he offered in Ahab's hearing: and the judgment was intended to be a demonstration, that Baal could not defend his worshippers against the indignation of JEHOVAH. The glory of God and the interests of true religion were therefore so greatly concerned in this decision, which was needful in order to prevent the utter apostasy and rejection of Israel, that the prophet might present this petition in wise zeal, and true benevolence; and doubtless he was immediately instructed by the Lord to do so. The benefit of the calamity would abundantly outweigh the miseries: for though many were hardened, yet doubtless numbers were eventually brought to repentance, and made to embrace and continue steadfast in the service of the true God. (Jam. 5:16—18.) SCOTT.

(so to speak) out of the clouds, as if, like Melchisedek, he were without father, mother, and descent, which made some of the Jews fancy he was an angel from heaven; but the apostle has assured us he was a man subject to like passions as we are, which perhaps intimates, not only that he was liable to the common infirmities of human nature, but, by natural temper, a man of strong passions, more hot and eager than most other men, and therefore the more fit to deal with the daring sinners of the age he lived in.

Observe, 1. His name; Elijahu, 'My God Jehovah is He,' (so it signifies,) 'is He who sends me, will own me, and bear me out, is He to whom I would bring Israel back, and who alone can effect that great work.' 2. His country; Gilead, on the other side Jordan; either Gad, or Manasseh: but whether a native of either tribe, is uncertain; the obscurity of his parentage was no prejudice to his eminency afterward; we need not inquire whence, but what men are; if it be a good thing, no matter though it come out of Nazareth. Israel was sore wounded, when God sent them this balm from Gilead, this physician thence. He is called a Tishbite, from Tishbe, a town there.

I. He foretold a famine; he went, and told it to Ahab; not to the people, to make them disaffected to the government, but to the king, in whose power it was to reform the land, and so, prevent the judgment. Probably, here proved Ahab for his idolatry and other wickedness, and told him that, unless he repented and reformed, this judgment would be brought on his land. Neither dew nor rain but according to my word; i. e. 'Expect none, till you hear from me again.' The apostle teaches us to understand this, not only of the word of prophecy, but the word of prayer, which turned the key of the clouds, James 5: 17, 18. In allusion to this story, it is said of God's witnesses, (Rev. 11: 6.) These have power to shut heaven, that it rain not in the days of their prophecy.

Elijah lets Ahab know, that the Lord Jehovah whom he had forsaken, is the God of Israel, a living God, not like the gods he worshipped, dead, dumb idols; that he was his servant in office, and messenger; that notwithstanding their present peace and prosperity, God was displeased with them for their idolatry, and would chastise them for it by the want of rain, which, when He withheld it, the power of their gods could not bestow; Jer. 14: 22. and this he confirms with a solemn oath, that Ahab might stand the more in awe of the threatening, the divine life being engaged for its accomplishment. He lets him know what interest he had in heaven; It shall be according to my word.

II. He was himself taken care of in that famine. 1. How he was hidden, v. 3. not so much for his preservation, for it does not appear Ahab immediately sought his life, but that he might not be solicited to revoke the sentence, the execution whereof he had said should be according to his word: it bodes ill to a people, when good men and good ministers are ordered to hide themselves; when God intended to send rain on the earth, then He bade Elijah go show himself to Ahab, ch. 18: 1. If Providence calls us to solitude and retirement, it becomes us to acquiesce; when we cannot be useful, we must be patient, and when we cannot work for God, we must sit still quietly for Him.

2. How he was fed. When the woman, the church, is driven into the wilderness, care is taken that she be fed and nourished there, time, times, and half a time, that is, three years and a half, which was just the time of Elijah's concealment. See Rev. 12: 6, 14. Elijah must drink of the brook, and the ravens were appointed to bring him meat, (v. 4.) and did so, v. 6. Here,

(1.) The provision was plentiful, good, and constant. We may suppose he fared not so sumptuously as the prophets of the groves, (ch. 18: 19.) yet better than the rest of the Lord's prophets, whom Obadiah fed with bread and water, ch. 18: 4. It ill becomes God's servants, especially the prophets, to be nice and curious about their food; if nature be sustained, no matter though the palate be not pleased; instead of envying those who have daintier fare, we should think how many there are, better than we, who live comfortably on coarser fare, and would be glad of our leavings. Elijah had but one meal brought him at a time, every morning and every evening, to teach him not to take thought for the morrow; let those who have but from hand to mouth, learn to live on Providence, and trust it for the bread of the day in the day; thank God for bread this day, and let tomorrow bring bread with it.

(2.) The caterers were very unlikely; ravens brought it him. Obadiah and others in Israel that had not bowed to Baal, would gladly have entertained him; but he was a man by himself, to be fed in an extraordinary way, a figure of John the Baptist, whose meat was locusts and wild honey. God could have sent angels to minister to

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The Lord will have witnesses to his truth in the worst of times: and as He does not immediately cast off his professing people, when they renounce his service; He employs various methods to convince them of their sin, and bring them to repentance.—If the severest temporal judgments be made effectual to bring men to serve God, they will have great cause to bless Him for sending them.—Fruitful seasons, and abundance of provisions for the body, are valuable mercies, and famine a tremendous evil: yet the liberty and opportunity of attending on divine ordinances are more valuable advantages; and a famine of the Word of God is above all to be dreaded and deprecated. (Am. 8: 11—14.)—The Lord will provide for those who serve Him faithfully: and He will teach them to be satisfied with their provisions though mean, and their situation though outwardly uncomfortable. Indeed, if we consider how much better we are dealt with than we deserve, and how many are destitute of the necessaries of life; we shall see abundant reason to be contented with food and raiment, of the meanest and coarsest kind: nor ought we ever to desire luxuries or superfluities.—All nature shall sooner change its course, than one of God's promises fail. We do not indeed now expect literally to be fed by ravens: but the Lord often employs selfish men, contrary to their nature and general character, to support his indigent people, or to maintain his cause by their property. The thanks, in this case, are due to the Lord, who sends provision by such instruments: but we should pray, that, as He has counteracted their natural disposition in this instance, He would be pleased also to change them by his renewing grace. SCOTT.

Verses 4—6.

Elijah was a very extraordinary person, and every circumstance relating to him was rendered equally extraordinary, in order to excite the attention of a thoughtless and hardened generation.—Ravens. (4) The command, or miraculous power of God, suspended their natural instinct, and made them act directly contrary to it. (1 Sam. 6:10—16.) It is useless and presumptuous to inquire whence they procured the bread and flesh, or how the food was prepared? He, who commanded them to feed his servant, had ten thousand ways of enabling them to fulfil his word.—Some have objected that ravens, being unclean birds, would pollute the food which they brought: but this arises from a mistake. The flesh of unclean animals might not be eaten; but the touch of them when living, communicated no ceremonial uncleanness, either to food, or any other thing: for asses and camels were also unclean; yet in constant use, for carrying provisions, as well as for other purposes. (Lev. 11:31.) SCOTT.

(4.) Ravens.] 'Orbym, transl. "merchants," Ezek. 27:27. See also 2 Chr. 21:16. and Neh. 4:7. "The Orbim, inhabitants of a town in the confines of the Arabs." Jerome. The birds of that name. Bochart, Gill. Buothr. The Heb. word includes every species of raven, and here perhaps means the rook, which lives on corn and insects. Enc. Brit. A number of voracious birds, having their nests near, probably brought food for their young [and in hot climates birds seek their prey in the morning and in the evening.], much of this they dropped, as providence ordered it, for the prophet. C. Taylor. Wil. [And modern instances are known of persons being supported several days in this way.] The voracious raven gluts itself when opportunity offers, and then hides the remainder of its food. Hence it is not difficult to conceive how ravens might be Elijah's purveyors, bringing flesh of lambs and poultry, their favorite food, and other portions, of bread, and morsels, the remnants of some table [better supplied than the rest]. Elijah. These birds, following their natural habits, might have collected the food, and, by the control of God, have simply deposited it at once on the spot convenient for the prophet's use.' Cond. Comm. But see SCOTT above. ED.

him, as He did afterward, (ch. 19: 5.) and as He did to our Savior; (Matt. 4: 11.) but He chose to send by winged messengers of another nature, to show that He serves his own purposes, by the meanest creatures, as effectually as by the mightiest. If it be asked, whence the ravens had this provision, how and where it was cooked, and whether they came honestly by it, we must answer as Jacob did, (Gen. 27: 20.) The Lord our God brought it to them, whose the earth is, and the fulness thereof, the world, and they that dwell therein. Ravens feed on insects and carrion themselves, yet they brought the prophet man's meat, and wholesome food; it is a pity those who bring the bread of life to others, should themselves take up with that which is not bread. Ravens neglect their own young; yet, when God pleases, they shall feed his prophet; young lions and young ravens may lack, and suffer hunger, but not they that fear the Lord, Ps. 34: 10. Ravens are themselves fed by special providence, (Job 38: 41. Ps. 147: 9.) and now they feed the prophet. Have we experienced God's special goodness to us and ours? Let us reckon ourselves obliged, thereby, to be kind to those that are his, for his sake. Let us learn hence, [1.] To acknowledge the sovereignty and power of God over all the creatures; He can make what use He pleases of them, either for judgment or mercy. [2.] To encourage ourselves in God in the greatest straits, and never to distrust Him.

V. 8—16. We have here an account of Elijah's further protection, and further provision, in his retirement. Observe,

I. The place he is sent to; Zarephath, or Sarepta, a city of Sidon, out of the borders of the land of Israel, v. 9. Our Savior notices this as an early and ancient indication of the favor of God designed for the poor Gentiles, in the fulness of time, Luke 4: 25, 26. Elijah was hated and driven out by his countrymen, therefore, Lo, he turns to the Gentiles, as the apostles were afterward ordered to do, Acts 18: 6. But why to a city of Sidon? Perhaps, because the worship of Baal, now the crying sin of Israel, came lately thence with Jezebel; (ch. 16: 31.) therefore thither he shall go, that thence may be fetched the destroyer of that idolatry. Jezebel was Elijah's greatest enemy; yet to show her the impotency of her malice, God will find a hiding-place for him even in her country; Christ never went among the Gentiles, except once into the coast of Sidon, Matt. 15: 21.

II. The person appointed to entertain him; not one of the rich merchants, or great men, of Sidon, not such a one as Obadiah, governor of Ahab's house, that fed the prophets, but a poor widow woman, destitute and desolate. It is God's way, and glory, to use and honor the weak and foolish things of the world. He is, in a special manner, the widows' God, and feeds them, therefore they must study what they shall render to Him.

III. The provision made him there; Providence brought the widow woman to meet him very opportunely at the gate of the city, v. 10. Observe, 1. Her case and character; She was, (1.) Very poor and necessitous; needy at the best, and now, by the general scarcity, reduced to the last extremity, v. 12. She had no fuel but the sticks she gathered in the streets, and no servant, to gather them; (v. 10.) more likely to receive alms than give entertainment; to her Elijah is sent, that he might still live on Providence, as much as when the ravens fed him; and it was in compassion to the low estate of his handmaiden.

(2.) Very humble and industrious, v. 10, 12. Her mind was brought to her condition, she complains not of her hardships, nor quarrels with the Divine Providence for withholding rain, but accommodates herself to it as well as she can; such as are of this temper, in a day of trouble, are best prepared for honor and relief from God.

(3.) Very charitable and generous; when this stranger desired her to fetch him water, she readily went, at the first word, v. 10, 11. She objected not the present scarcity, nor asked what he would give for a draught, nor hinted he was a stranger, an Israelite, with whom, perhaps, the Sidonians cared not to have dealings. She did not excuse herself on account of weakness through famine, or the urgency of her own affairs; did not tell him she had something else to do than to go on his errands; but left gathering sticks for herself, to fetch water for him, which perhaps she did the more willingly, being moved with the gravity of his aspect. We should be ready to do any kind office, even to strangers; if we have not wherewith to give to the distressed, we must be the more ready to work for them; a cup of cold water, though it cost us no more than the labor of fetching, shall, in nowise, lose its reward.

(4.) She had great confidence in the word of God; it was a great trial of her faith and obedience, when, having told the prophet she had but just enough for herself and son, he bade her make a cake for him, and make his first; if we consider, it will appear as great a trial as could be, in [her circumstances.] Elijah, it is true, made mention of the God of Israel, (v. 14.) but what was that to a Sidonian? Or, if she had a veneration for the name Jehovah, and valued the God of Israel as the true God, yet what assurance had she this stranger was his prophet, or had any warrant to speak in his name? It was easy for a hungry vagrant to impose on her; but she gets over all these objections, and obeys the precept, in dependence on the promise, v. 15. O woman, great was thy faith; all things considered, it exceeded that of the widow, who, when she had but two mites, cast them into the treasury. Those that can venture on the promise of God, will make no difficulty of exposing and emptying themselves in his service, by giving Him his dues out of a little, and giving Him his part first. They that deal with God, must deal on trust; seek first his kingdom, and then other things shall be added: by the law, the first-fruits were God's, Num. 15: 20, 21. But surely the increase of this widow's faith, to such a degree as to enable her thus to deny herself, and to depend on the divine promise, was as great a miracle in the kingdom of grace, as the increase of her oil, in the kingdom of providence. Happy are they, who can thus, against hope, believe, and obey in hope.

2. The care God took of her and her guest, v. 16. Never did corn or olive so increase in the grownatures, and capacities; perhaps this poor widow had received some pre-intimation of Elijah's coming, and a command to entertain him, nothing doubting. SCOTT.

Verse 10.

Now, when nothing but waste and wantonness, wrath and ruin, battles and blood, is in the palace of kings, the sacred history turns our eyes to the economy, magnanimity, self-denial, boundless generosity, humility, and piety of a virtuous and obscure individual; like so many millions whose names are recorded in heaven, though the world never hears of them, nor inscribes them on the blazoned roll of glory! And who, alas! have filled that roll? How many, whose spirit God loves; God, in whom alone is true glory—who alone can confer it? Let us receive the startling lesson! The virtues of this widow commend the truth of Elijah's story to every heart, from the eternal principles here illustrated. It is an internal evidence, which cold-hearted, self-conceited, and penny-wise infidelity cannot impugn. ED.

17 ¶ And it came to pass, after these things, that [d] the son of the woman, the mistress of the house, fell sick: and his sickness was so sore, [e] that there was no breath left in him.

18 And she said unto Elijah, [f] What have I to do with thee, [g] O thou man of God? [h] art thou come unto me to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son?

19 And he said unto her, Give me thy son. And he took him out of her bosom, and carried him up [i] into a loft, where he abode, and laid him upon his own bed.

ing (says Bp. Hall) as these in the using; but the multiplying of the seed sown, (2 Cor. 9: 10.) in the common course of providence, is an instance of the power and goodness of God, not to be overlooked because common. The meal and the oil multiplied, not in the hoarding but in the spending; there is that scattereth, yet increaseth; when God blesses a little, it will go a great way, even beyond expectation; as, on the contrary, though there be abundance, if He blow upon it, it comes to little, Hag. 1: 9. 2: 16. Still, miracles shall be the prophet's daily bread. Above two years, this poor widow and her son were supplied, v. 15: there is nothing lost by being kind to God's people and ministers; she that received a prophet, had a prophet's reward. Christ has promised those who open their doors to Him, that He will come in to them, and sup with them, and they with Him, Rev. 3: 20. The reward answered the service; she generously made one cake for the prophet, and was repaid with many for herself and son. When Abraham offers his only son to God, he is told he shall be the father of multitudes; what is laid out in piety, or charity, is let out to the best interest, on the best securities. They that trust in God, shall not be ashamed in the evil time, but in days of famine shall be satisfied, Ps. 37: 19.

V. 17—24. Here is a further recompense to the widow for her kindness: as if it were a small thing to be kept alive, I. Her son, when dead, is restored to life, and so to her. Being fed miraculously, did not secure him from sickness and death. Comp. John 6: 49, 50. This affliction was to this widow as a thorn in the flesh, lest she should be lifted up above measure with the favors done her, and the honors put upon her. Note, We must not think it strange, if we meet with very sharp afflictions, even then when in the way of duty, and eminent service of God; and when we have the clearest manifestations of God's favor and good will toward us, even then we must prepare for the rebukes of Providence; our mountain never stands so strong, but it may be moved, therefore, in this world, we must rejoice with trembling. Her pathetic complaint to the prophet, of this affliction, it should seem was rather to give vent to her sorrow, than in any hope of relief, v. 18.

1. She had spoken calmly of her own, and her child's death, when she expected to die for want, v. 12. Yet now that her child dies, and not so miserably as by famine, she is extremely disturbed: we may speak lightly of an affliction at a distance, but when it toucheth us, we are troubled, Job 4: 5. Then she spake deliberately, now in haste; it is hard to keep our spirits composed, when troubles come on us suddenly and unexpectedly, and in our peace and prosperity. She calls him a man of God, yet quarrels with him, as if he had occasioned the death of her child, and is ready to wish she had never seen him, forgetting past mercies and miracles; 'What have I done against thee?' So some understand it; 'Wherein have I offended thee, or been wanting in my duty?'

2. Yet she expresses herself penitently; 'Art thou come to call my sin to thy remembrance, as the cause of the affliction, and so to call it to my remembrance, as the effect of the affliction?' Note, When God removes our comforts, He remembers our sins against us, perhaps the iniquities of our youth, though long since past, Job 13: 26. Our sins are the death of our children. When God thus remembers our sins against us, He designs, thereby, to make us remember them against ourselves, and repent of them.

II. The prophet's address to God, on this occasion; he gave no answer to her expostulation, but brought it to God, and laid the case before Him; he took the dead child to his own bed, v. 19. Probably, he had a particular kindness to the child, and found the affliction his own, more than by sympathy; he retired to his chamber, and humbly reasoned with God concerning the death of the child, v. 20. He pleads the greatness of the affliction to the poor mother. He pleads his own concern. 'I shall be reflected upon, others will be afraid of entertaining me.' He earnestly begs of God to restore the child to life again, v. 21. We do not read, before this, of any raised to life; yet Elijah, by a divine impulse, prays for the resurrection of this child, which yet will not warrant us to do the like: David expected not, by fasting and prayer, to bring his child back to life; but Elijah had a power to work miracles, David not; he stretched himself on the child, to affect himself, and to show how much he was affected with the case, how desirous he was of the restoration of the child; he would, if he could, put life into him by his own breath and warmth; also to give a sign of what God would do by his power, and what He does by his grace, in raising dead souls to a spiritual life; the Holy Ghost comes upon them, overshadows them, and puts life into them, he is very particular in his prayer, I pray Thee let this child's soul come into him again; which plainly supposes the existence of the soul in a state of separation from the body, and, consequently, its immortality; which, Grotius thinks, God designed by this miracle to give intimation and evidence

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8—16. The Lord does not generally provide long together for his people in the same way, or by the same means; lest they should rest in them, and expect help from them. Frequently He raises supplies from those, who themselves need relief: 'the abundance of their joy, and their deep poverty, abound unto the riches of their liberality.' (2 Cor. 8: 1—5. 9: 8—11.) and He supplies their wants, whilst they are encouraged to communicate of their pittance to others still more destitute.—They, who come unto God and walk with Him, must simply trust in Him, nay, venture their lives and souls on his word, and at his command renounce every present interest, in expectation of future and more enduring advantages. Genuine faith encourages men to do this; while unbelief dislikes the security, holds fast things present, and, for the perishing pleasures and interests of this world, foregoes the blessings of eternal salvation. But none can be losers in the event by giving up secular advantages, at the Lord's command; and what is expended on his people, for his sake, shall be recompensed as if given to Himself: so that the self-denial and liberality of faith, are the best means of excluding the fear of future want, of providing for our families, and of placing out our substance at the highest interest, and on the most unexceptionable security. In these funds the poor may obtain property, as well as the rich; for a morsel of bread, or a cup of water, will go as far, when it is all that we can give, as thousands of gold and silver when they can be spared. (Prov. 19: 17. Mark 12: 41—44. Luke 6: 27—36. 2 Cor 8: 10—15.) SCOTT.

Verse 17.

Perhaps the woman's son died suddenly, before the prophet had opportunity to pray for his recovery; because the Lord intended a greater display of his own glory, [a testimony of a final resurrection to that besotted age,] and a more distinguishing favor to the woman, than the sparing of his life: or, he was left to die without any miraculous interposition, to try her faith. (Mark 5:35—43. John 11:1—10.) SCOTT.

Verse 18.

This woman had doubtless heard, that the drought had come on Israel in answer to Elijah's prayer; and perhaps she supposed her affliction had come on her in the same way. 'Their sins are said to be "called to remembrance" by God, when He punishes them.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, Ez. 21:23.) SCOTT.

Verse 19.

Loft.] 'The LXX translate it, an upper room; which he had to himself for his study, meditation, and prayer; as Elisha afterwards had in another place: 2 K. 4:10.' Bp. Patrick. ID.

Verse 20.

Elijah himself could not understand the mystery of this dispensation; but greatly wondered that the Lord should bring evil on the woman, who entertained him, for his sake, as well as on those who rejected both God and his prophet; and he expostulated with God on the occasion. ID.

21 And [l] he * stretched himself upon the child three times, and cried unto the LORD, and said, [m] O LORD my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul come † into him again.

22 And the LORD heard the voice of Elijah; and the soul of the child came into him again, [n] and he revived.

23 And Elijah took the child, and brought him down out of the chamber into the house, and delivered him unto his mother: and Elijah said, [o] See, thy son liveth.

24 And the woman said to Elijah, [p] Now by this I know that thou art a man of God, and that [q] the word of the LORD in thy mouth is truth.

CHAP. XVIII.

Elijah is sent to meet Ahab, 1, 2. Ahab and pious Obadiah go different ways, to search the land for pasture, 3—6. Elijah meets Obadiah and sends him to call Ahab, 7—16. Ahab, at Elijah's word, convenes Israel, with the prophets of Baal, at Carmel, 17—20. Elijah proposes to decide, whether JEHOVAH or Baal be God, by proving which would answer by fire, 21—24. Baal's prophets invoke him in vain, 25—29. Elijah prepares a sacrifice, causes much water to be poured upon it, and calls on JEHOVAH, who answers by fire consuming the altar with the sacrifice; the people are convinced that JEHOVAH is God; and at Elijah's word they slay Baal's prophets, 30—40. Elijah gives Ahab notice of abundant rain, which he obtains by prayer; and then he runs before Ahab's chariot to Jezreel, 41—46.

AND it came to pass [a] after many days, that the word of the LORD came to Elijah in [b] the third year, saying, [c] Go, show thyself unto Ahab; and [d] I will send rain upon the earth.

2 And Elijah [e] went to show himself unto Ahab: and there was [f] a sore famine in Samaria.

3 And Ahab called ‡ Obadiah, which was § the governor of his house. (Now Obadiah [g] feared the LORD greatly:

4 For it was so, when ‖ Jezebel [h] cut off the prophets of the LORD, that Obadiah took an hundred prophets, and hid them by fifty in a cave, and fed them with bread and water.)

5 And Ahab said unto Obadiah, Go into the land, unto all fountains of water, and unto all brooks: peradventure we may find grass to save the horses and mules alive, that we lose not all the beasts.

6 So they divided the land between them to pass throughout it: Ahab went [i] by himself one way, and Obadiah went [k] by himself another way.

7 And as Obadiah was in the way, behold, Elijah met him: and he knew him, and fell on his face, and said, Art not thou that my lord Elijah?

8 And he answered him, I am: go, tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here.

9 And he said, What have I sinned, that thou wouldest deliver thy servant into the hand of Ahab, to slay me?

10 As the LORD thy God liveth, there is no nation or kingdom, whither my lord hath not sent to seek thee: and when they said, He is not there; he took an oath of the kingdom and nation, that they found thee not.

11 And now thou sayest, Go, tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here.

12 And it shall come to pass, as soon as I am gone from thee, that the Spirit of the LORD shall carry thee whither I know not; and so when I come and tell Ahab, and he cannot find thee, he shall slay me: but I thy servant fear the LORD from my youth.

13 Was it not told my lord what I did when Jezebel slew the prophets of the LORD, how I hid an hundred men of the LORD's prophets by fifties in a cave, and fed them with bread and water?

14 And now thou sayest, Go, tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here: and he shall slay me.

15 And Elijah said, As the LORD of hosts liveth, before whom I stand, I will surely show myself unto him to-day.

16 So Obadiah went to meet Ahab, and told him: and Ahab went to meet Elijah.

17 And it came to pass, when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troubleth Israel?

18 And he answered, I have not troubled Israel; but thou, and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the LORD, and thou hast followed Baalim.

19 Now therefore send, and gather to me all Israel unto mount Carmel, and the prophets of Baal four hundred and fifty, and the prophets of the grove four hundred, which eat at Jezebel's table.

20 So Ahab sent unto all the children of Israel, and gathered the prophets together unto mount Carmel.

21 And Elijah came unto all the people, and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? if the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word.

22 Then said Elijah unto the people, I, even I only, remain a prophet of the LORD; but Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men.

23 Let them therefore give us two bullocks; and let them choose one bullock for themselves, and cut it in pieces, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under: and I will dress the other bullock, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under:

24 And call ye on the name of your god, and I will call on the name of the LORD: and the God that answereth by fire, let him be God. And all the people answered and said, It is well spoken.

25 And Elijah said unto the prophets of Baal, Choose you one bullock for yourselves, and dress it first; for ye are many; and call on the name of your god, but put no fire under.

26 And they took the bullock which was given them, and they dressed it, and called on the name of Baal from morning even until noon, saying, O Baal, hear us. But there was no voice, nor any that answered. And they leaped upon the altar which was made.

27 And it came to pass at noon, that Elijah mocked them, and said, Cry aloud: for he is a god; either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked.

28 And they cried aloud, and cut themselves after their manner with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them.

29 And it came to pass, when midday was past, and they prophesied until the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, that there was neither voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regarded.

30 And Elijah said unto all the people, Come near unto me. And all the people came near unto him. And he repaired the altar of the LORD that was broken down.

31 And Elijah took twelve stones, according to the number of the tribes of the sons of Jacob, unto whom the word of the LORD came, saying, Israel shall be thy name:

32 And with the stones he built an altar in the name of the LORD: and he made a trench about the altar, as great as would contain two measures of seed.

33 And he put the wood in order, and cut the bullock in pieces, and laid him on the wood, and said, Fill four barrels with water, and pour it on the burnt sacrifice, and on the wood.

34 And he said, Do it the second time. And they did it the second time. And he said, Do it the third time. And they did it the third time.

35 And the water ran round about the altar; and he filled the trench also with water.

36 And it came to pass at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, that Elijah the prophet came near, and said, LORD God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at thy word.

37 Hear me, O LORD, hear me, that this people may know that thou art the LORD God, and that thou hast turned their heart back again.

38 Then the fire of the LORD fell, and consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench.

39 And when all the people saw it, they fell on their faces: and they said, The LORD, he is the God; the LORD, he is the God.

40 And Elijah said unto them, Take the prophets of Baal; let not one of them escape. And they took them: and Elijah brought them down to the brook Kishon, and slew them there.

41 And Elijah said unto Ahab, Get thee up, eat and drink; for there is a sound of abundance of rain.

42 So Ahab went up to eat and to drink. And Elijah went up to the top of Carmel; and he cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees,

43 And said to his servant, Go up now, look toward the sea. And he went up, and looked, and said, There is nothing. And he said, Go again seven times.

44 And it came to pass at the seventh time, that he said, Behold, there ariseth a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand. And he said, Go up, say unto Ahab, Prepare thy chariot, and get down, that the rain stop thee not.

45 And it came to pass in the mean while, that the heaven was black with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain. And Ahab rode, and went to Jezreel.

46 And the hand of the LORD was on Elijah; and he girded up his loins, and ran before Ahab to the entrance of Jezreel.

CHAP. XVIII. In this ch. Elijah's appearance is as public, as, before, his retirement was close; the days appointed for his concealment being finished, he is now commanded to show himself to Ahab, and expect rain. It is a ch. in which are many things very observable.

V. 1—16. I. Israel's sad state on two accounts: 1. Jezebel cut off the prophets of the Lord, (v. 4.) slew them, v. 13. Being an idolater, she was a persecutor, and made Ahab one. Even in those bad times, there were some good people, and some good prophets that instructed them. The priests and Levites were all gone to Judah and Jerusalem; (2 Chr. 11: 13, 14.) but God raised up these prophets to read and expound the law in private meetings, or in families that retained their integrity, for we read not of any synagogues at this time; they had not the spirit of prophecy, nor did they offer sacrifice, or burn incense, but taught people to live well, and keep close to the God of Israel. These Jezebel aimed to extirpate, which was as much a public calamity as a public iniquity, and threatened the utter ruin of religion's poor remains in Israel. Those few that escaped the sword, were forced to abscond, and hide themselves in caves, where they were cut off, though not from life, yet from usefulness, the end and comfort of life; and when the prophets were persecuted, no doubt, their friends, the few good people in the land, were treated in like manner.

Yet, bad as things were, there was one very good man, who was great at court, Obadiah, who answers his name, a servant of the Lord, one who feared God, and was faithful to Him, yet steward of the household to Ahab. Observe his character; he feared the Lord greatly; (v. 3.) was not only good, but zealously and eminently good; and he feared the Lord from his youth, v. 12. Early piety, it is to be hoped, will be eminent piety. It was strange so wicked a man as Ahab, would prefer him, and continue him his steward; certainly it was because he was a man of celebrated honesty, industry, and ingenuousness, one in whom he could confide, v. 5. Joseph and Daniel were preferred, because none were so fit as they, for the places they were preferred to. Note, Those who profess religion, should study to recommend themselves to the esteem even of those that are without, by their integrity, fidelity, and application to business. It was strange so good a man as Obadiah, would accept of preferment in a court so addicted to idolatry, and all manner of wickedness. We may be sure, it was not necessary he should be of the king's religion, and conform to the statutes of Omri, or the law of the house of Ahab. Obadiah would not have accepted the place, on such conditions, nor was Ahab so impolitic as to exclude those from offices, that were fit to serve him, merely because they would not join him in his devotions; the man that is true to God, will be faithful to his prince. Obadiah therefore could, with a good conscience, enjoy the place, and therefore would not decline, or give it up, though he foresaw he could not do in it the good he desired; they that fear God, need not go out of the world, bad as it is. God has his remnant among all sorts, high and low; there were saints in Nero's household, and in Ahab's. This great good man used his power to protect God's prophets, v. 4. See how wonderfully God raises up friends for his ministers and people, for their shelter in difficult times, there where one should least expect them; bread and water were now scarce commodities, yet Obadiah will find a competency of both for God's prophets, to keep them alive for service hereafter, though now they were laid aside.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17—24. Neither faith nor obedience, however exemplary, can exclude afflictions and death. But the Lord bears with our infirmities, and compassionates our sorrows: and we should pity and readily help each other, according to the example and command of Christ. (Gal. 6: 1—5.)—The Lord by afflictions 'calls our sins to remembrance;' and this should quiet our spirits, and lead us to self-examination and repentance, that we may obtain forgiveness from Him: and thus all shall issue in our increase of faith, assurance of hope, and joyful expectation of every promised good.—Thus when Jesus comes to communicate his blessings, the convinced, trembling sinner often mistakes the meaning of those humbling instructions He imparts, and those trials He employs; but the loving Savior pities and bears with such trembling souls: and when He has turned their mourning into joy, by reviving their hopes and forgiving their sins, they admire his love and power, and know assuredly that his word is truth; and expect every future good in reliance on his promise, and obedience to his holy will. SCOTT.

Verses 21, 22.

The expression, 'Let this child's soul come into him again,' not only intimates the prophet's certainty that he was really dead; but it marks the distinction between the rational soul and the earthly body to be as real, as that between the house and its inhabitant: for both the prophet and the historian, 'speaking as they were moved by the Holy Ghost,' used proper language. (Gen. 22:5, 6. John 9:27—34. Rom. 4:18—22. Heb. 11:17—19.)—Elijah's petition was no doubt directed by immediate inspiration. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1, 2. Some think Elijah remained just two years at Zarephath; and that the six months preceded his retiring to the brook Cherith. (Luke 4:25.)—The extremity of the famine rendered it the more dangerous for him to show himself to the enraged tyrant: but at this time he was raised above all fear of what flesh could do unto him. (19:2.) ID.

Verse 3.

Obadiah signifies The servant of the LORD. Obadiah was so faithful and useful a servant to Ahab, that even Jezebel's instigation did not induce him to dismiss or injure him: and he was, it seems, willing to retain his place, though perilous and difficult, while he could with a safe conscience; as he might do some good, and prevent some evil, by continuing in it: and, though he witnessed abominable idolatries and iniquities, we may be sure, that he was not required to bow his knee unto Baal. (Dan. 2:46—49. 3:1—7.) 'He feared the LORD greatly.' Obadiah, at a distance from religious ordinances, and surrounded by the worst of examples and by strong temptations, was eminently pious and devoted to God! (Gen. 22:11, 12. Ec. 12:11—14.) SCOTT.

Verse 4.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. The severest judgments will not of themselves humble or change the hearts of sinners; who often grow more hardened under them, even to desperation. The imagined fire of purgatory, therefore, or the real torments of hell, possess no purifying efficacy; and the wicked under the anguish of their sufferings will continually increase in wickedness, and accumulate wrath to all eternity. For nothing, except the atoning blood of Christ, can expiate the guilt of sin; nothing, except the sanctifying Spirit of God, can purge away its pollution: and all other expedients are satanical delusions, to keep men from this one [x] fountain, which God hath opened for sin and for uncleanness.'—The enmity of man's heart against God, expresses itself by persecuting those who bear his image and seek his glory: yet He protects them, until their testimony be finished.—It has been the common lot of his prophets and faithful servants, to be lodged in caves or dens of the earth, and fed with bread and water, (if that could be procured,) while the ministers of Satan have rioted in luxury. (Heb. 11: 35—38.) Yet the Lord has had a remnant in all places, where any part of his Word has been known, in every age of the world: and notwithstanding errors and irregularities, that spiritual worship, and that repentance, fear, and love of his name, which are the fruits of his Holy Spirit, are accepted through the Redeemer, and by faith in Him.—We should be very cautious about leaving, or persuading others to leave, the posts assigned in providence, however perilous or ensnaring; while they can be maintained without sinful compliances, and while they afford opportunities of doing good.—God indeed has often remarkably preserved those, who have ventured their lives freely in his service, in times of triumphant wickedness; yet, singular activity, prudence, and fidelity in secular concerns, frequently prove the means of their security. (Dan. 6: 3—5.)—The servants of God may, in his cause, boldly face their most powerful, enraged enemies; for they dare not touch them when He intimidates their hearts, and cannot when He restrains their hands: (Matt. 14: 3—5. Acts 4: 13—22. 5: 26—39.) and such as fear the Lord, however exalted in life, will greatly respect his faithful servants, though poor and hated by all around them. it.—These prophets were, probably, brought up in the schools of the prophets, first instituted by Samuel, which still remained, and it made very serviceable by the blessing of God on them. (1 Sam. 10:5, 6. 2 Kings 2:3. 4:1.)—They worshipped the God of Israel towards, though not at, the temple and Jerusalem: (Note, 8:28—30.) and it seems there were considerable numbers of believers dispersed through the tribes. Though Obadiah's conduct was no secret, he was still protected and employed by Ahab!—Bread and water.] That is, the necessaries of life; 'food convenient for them.' (13:8, 9, 16, 22.) SCOTT.

Verses 5, 6.

Horses, &c. (5) Ahab seems to have been more anxious about the animals, which ministered to his luxury, than about those, which were more immediately necessary to his poor subjects, as sheep, goats, and oxen. That the king in person should go on such a business, could only be the effect of the extremity of the famine. Probably most of the cattle, and many of the people, had perished: yet no mention was made of returning to the Lord with repentance, fasting, and prayer! (Joel 1:13—15. 2:15—17.) Had God never sent to them, it seems they would never have applied to Him to terminate the calamity, whatever extremities they had endured: but He had a remnant, for whose sake He was pleased to return to them in mercy; and the glory of his name required, that He should not yet give up Israel to utter destruction. (19:18. Judg. 3:9, 10, 14. Rom. 11:1—6.) SCOTT.

(5.) Peradventure we may find grass.] 'In droughts of 6 to 10 months in the E. how often have we seen men, like Obadiah, going along in marshy places, or by the sides of tanks, in search of grass for their cattle. A poor fellow, with a basket of palmirah leaves on his back, and a kind of hoe in his hand, strolls from fountain to brook, and no sooner does he see a green patch of verdure, than he runs eagerly to the spot. Perhaps he meets another in search of the same thing, when each declares he had the first view. They set to work, snarling at each other, and dealing out all kinds of abuse, till they have cleared the place of every green blade. Although the herbage seems withered past all recovery, the effect of rain is like enchantment on the scene.' [Comp. 2 Sam. 23:4.] ROBERTS.

Verse 10.

No nation, &c.] That is, in the neighborhood, among Ahab's dependents and allies.—It is probable, that resentment and enmity greatly influenced Ahab; and that Jezebel intended to cut off Elijah also, if he could have been found, at least, unless he consented to remove the famine. But Ahab was overawed by his unexpected appearance and intrepidity, and did not dare to proceed against him. 2 K. 1:15, 16.) SCOTT.

17 ¶ And it came to pass, when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou [h] he that troubleth Israel?

18 And he answered, [i] I have not troubled Israel; but thou, and thy father's house, [k] in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the LORD, and thou hast followed Baalim.

19 Now therefore send, and gather to me all Israel unto [l] mount Carmel, and [m] the prophets of Baal four hundred and fifty, and the [n] prophets of the groves four hundred, which [o] eat at Jezebel's table.

20 So Ahab sent unto all the children of Israel, and gathered the prophets together unto mount Carmel.

21 And Elijah came unto all the people, and said, [p] How long halt ye between two *opinions? [q] if the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people [r] answered him not a word.

22 Then said Elijah unto the people, I, even [s] I only, remain a prophet of the LORD; but [t] Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men.

less they swore it, and promised likewise, on oath, that if ever they found him among them, they would deliver him up. This, it should seem, was not so much that he might punish him for denouncing the judgment, as that he might oblige him to recall it, because he had said it should be according to his word; conceiving of him, as men foolishly conceive of witches, that if they can but compel them to bless what they have bewitched, it will be well again, or as the king of Moab did of Balaam. I incline to this, because we find, when they came together, Elijah, knowing what Ahab wanted, appointed him to meet him on mt. Carmel, and Ahab complied with the appointment, though Elijah took such a way to revoke the sentence, and bless the land, as perhaps he little thought of.

2. God, at length, ordered Elijah to present himself to Ahab, for the time was now come, when He would send rain on the earth, (v. 1.) or, rather, on the land: above two years, he had lain hid at Zarephath, and one year by the brook Cherith; so the third year, here spoken of, (v. 1.) was the fourth of the famine, which lasted, in all, three years and six months, Luke 4: 25. James 5: 17.

3. Obadiah saluted Elijah with great respect, v. 7. By this it appeared he did indeed fear God greatly, that he did honor to one that was God's ambassador extraordinary, and had a great interest in heaven.

Elijah, in answer, transfers the title of honor to Ahab; 'Call him thy lord, not me;' that is a fitter title for a prince than a prophet, who seeks not honor from men. Prophets should be called seers, and shepherds, and watchmen, and ministers, rather than lords; as those that mind duty more than dominion. He bids Obadiah go tell the king he was there to speak with him, v. 8. He would have the king know before, that it might not surprise him, and that he might be sure it was the prophet's own act, to present himself.

Obadiah begs to be excused, it might prove as much as his life was worth. He tells Elijah what great search Ahab had made for him, and how much his heart was on finding him, v. 10. taking it for granted, Elijah would again withdraw, v. 12. He thought he was not in earnest, but intended only to expose the impotency of Ahab's malice; and he is sure Ahab would be so enraged at the disappointment, that he would put him to death for making a fool of him, or for not laying hands on Elijah himself, when he had him in his reach, v. 12. Tyrants and persecutors, in their passion, are often unreasonably outrageous, even toward their friends and confidants. Finally, he pleads that he did not deserve to be thus exposed, and put in peril of his life, v. 9. He mentions what he had done, v. 13. not in pride or ostentation, but to convince Elijah that he deserved not to be bantered as one of the tools of Ahab's persecution.

Elijah satisfies him; v. 15. and let Obadiah but know he spake seriously, and really intended it, and he will not scruple to carry the message. Elijah swears, by the Lord of hosts, who has all power in his hands, and was therefore able to protect his servant against all the powers of hell and earth.

Notice is hereby soon brought to Ahab, that Elijah had sent him a challenge to meet him immediately at such a place, and Ahab accepts the challenge, v. 16. Had he, by his spies, surprised Elijah, he would have triumphed over him; thus surprised by him, we may suppose he even trembled to look him in the face; he hated, yet feared him, as Herod John.

V. 17—20. We have here the meeting between as bad a king as ever the world was plagued with, and as good a prophet as ever blessed the church.

1. Ahab, like himself, basely accuses Elijah. Art thou he that troubleth Israel, v. 17. How unlike this to that of Obadiah, v. 7. Obadiah feared God greatly, Ahab had sold himself to work wickedness; both discovered their character by the manner of their address. One may guess how people stand affected to God, by observing how they stand affected to his people and ministers. Note, It has been the lot of the best and most useful men, to be called and counted the troublers of the land, and to be run down as public grievances. Even Christ and his apostles were thus misrepresented, Acts 17: 6.

2. Elijah, like himself, boldly returned the charge on the king, and proved it on him, that he was the troubler of Israel, v. 17. They that procure God's judgments, do the mischief, not he tha foretells them, and gives warning of them, that the nation may repent, and prevent them. I would have healed Israel, but they would not be healed. Ahab is the Achan, the troubler, who follows Balaam, those accursed things. Nothing creates more trouble to a land than the impiety and profaneness of princes and their families.

3. As one having authority immediately from the King of kings, he orders a convention of the states to be forthwith summoned to meet at mt. Carmel, where there had been an altar built to God, v. 30. Probably, on that mountain they had had an eminent high place, where, formerly, the pure worship of God had been kept up, as well as it could be any where but at Jerusalem. Thither all Israel must come, to give Elijah the meeting, and the prophets of Baal who were dispersed all the country over, with those of the groves who were Jezebel's domestic chaplains.

4. Ahab issues writs accordingly, to convene this great assembly, (v. 20.) either because he feared Elijah, and durst not oppose him; (Saul stood in awe of Samuel more than of God;) or because he hoped Elijah would bless the land, and speak the word that they might have rain, and, on those terms, they would be all at his beck.

V. 21—40. Ahab and the people expected Elijah should now bless the land, and pray for rain; but he has other work to do first. The people must be brought to repent and reform, and then they may look for the removal of the judgment, but not till then. This is the right method; God will first prepare our heart, and then cause his ear to hear; will first turn us to Him, and then turn to us, Ps. 10: 17.—70: 3. Deserters must not look for God's favor, till they return to their allegiance.

Three years and a half's famine would not bring them back to God; but now Elijah will endeavor to convince their judgments. It was great condescension in God, that He would suffer so plain a case to be disputed, and would permit Baal to be a competitor with Him; but thus God would have every mouth to be stopped, and all flesh to become silent before Him.

1. Elijah reproves the people for mixing the worship of God, and the worship of Baal, together. Not only some Israelites worshipped God, and others Baal, but the same Israelites sometimes worshipped one, and sometimes the other. This he calls, (v. 21.) Halting between two opinions or thoughts. They worshipped God, to please the prophets, but worshipped Baal, to please Jezebe,

Verse 17.

Elijah was the grand opposer of Ahab's plan, for bringing Israel to unite in the worship of Baal, and so making, according to his views, a quiet settlement of the religion of the nation: and in this sense he perhaps deemed him 'a troubler of Israel.' (Acts 16:19—24. 17:5—9.) —But it is not easy to determine what his precise sentiments were concerning the drought, which came at Elijah's word. If he thought, it was caused and continued by the prophet's power, and could be removed at his will; and that he troubled Israel in not removing it; he must have been disposed to credit any absurdity, rather than believe that JEHOVAH was the Author of it, and that it could be removed only by his power; or allow that it was his interest and duty to return to the worship of God which he had forsaken. and curry favor at court. Now Elijah shows them the absurdity of this; he does not insist on their relation to Jehovah; but enters on the merits of the cause. There can be but one God, but one infinite, and but one supreme; there needs but one God, one omnipotent, one all-sufficient: what occasion for addition to that which is perfect? Now, if, on trial, it appears that Baal is that one infinite, omnipotent Being, that one supreme Lord and all-sufficient Benefactor, you ought to renounce Jehovah, and cleave to Baal only: but if Jehovah be that one God, Baal is a cheat, and you must have no more to do with him. Note, 1. It is very wrong to halt between God and Baal. Comp. Mark 9: 38, 39. with Matt. 12: 30. The service of God, and the service of sin, the dominion of Christ, and the dominion of our lusts, these are the two thoughts which it is dangerous halting between. Those do so, that are unresolved under their convictions; unstable and unsteady in their purposes; promise fair, but do not perform; begin well, but do not hold on; are inconsistent with themselves, indifferent, lukewarm in that which is good. Their heart is divided, (Hos. 10: 2.) whereas God will have all or none. 2. We are fairly put to our choice, whom we will serve, Josh. 24: 15. If we can find one that has more right to us, or will be a better master to us, than God, we may take him at our peril. God demands no more from us than He can make out a title to. [Who can fathom the infinitude of our obligations to Him! Our relations to Him cause this to transcend other duties, as much as these relations transcend our thought or conception!]

This fair proposal of the case which Elijah here makes, the people knew not what to say to; they could say nothing to justify themselves, and would say nothing to condemn themselves, but, as people confounded, let him say what he would.

II. He proposes to bring the matter to a fair trial; and it was so much the fairer, because Baal had all the external advantages on his side. However, it is put to this experiment, v. 23. Elijah, doubtless, had a special commission from God to put it to this test, else he had tempted God and affronted religion; but the case was extraordinary, and the judgment on it would be of use, not only then, but in all ages. It is an instance of the courage of Elijah, that he durst stand alone in the cause of God against such powers and numbers; and the issue encourages all God's witnesses and advocates never to fear the face of man.

III. The people join issue with him, v. 24. They allow the proposal to be fair and unexceptionable; were very desirous to see the experiment tried, and seemed resolved to abide by the issue. They that were firm for God, doubted not but it would end to his honor: the indifferent, were willing to be determined. Ahab and the prophets of Baal durst not oppose, for fear of the people, and hoped that either they could obtain fire from heaven, (though they never had yet,) and the rather, because, as some think, they worshipped the sun in Baal; or, that Elijah could not, because not at the temple, where God was wont thus to manifest his glory.

IV. The prophets of Baal try first, but in vain, with their God. They covet the precedency, not only for honor, but that if they could in the least seem to gain their point, Elijah might not be admitted to make the trial. Elijah allows it them; (v. 25.) gives them the leading for their greater confusion; only, knowing that the working of Satan is with lying wonders, he takes care to prevent a fraud, Be sure to put no fire under.

1. We may well imagine what a noise 450 men made, when they cried as one man, and with all their might, and this, for hours, longer than Diana's worshippers, Acts 19: 34. How senseless, how brutish! Like fools, they leaped upon the altar, as if themselves to become sacrifices: or, thus to express their great earnestness. They leaped up and down, or danced about the altar: they hoped, by their dancing, to please their deity. Like madmen, they cut themselves with knives and lancets, (v. 28.) for vexation that they were not answered, or in a sort of prophetic fury, hoping to obtain the favor of their god, by offering their own blood, when they could not with the blood of their bullock. God never required his worshippers thus to honor Him; but the service of the devil, though, in some instances, it pleases and pampers the body, yet, in other things, is really cruel to it, as in envy and drunkenness. It seems, this was the manner of the worshippers of Baal: God expressly forbade his worshippers to cut themselves, Deut. 14: 1. He insists on it, that we mortify our lusts and corruptions; [so as to keep the 'lower propensities' in subjection, not destroy them; for then death ensues; as they are part of our constitution as human beings;] but corporal penances and severities, such as the Papists use, which have no tendency to that, are no pleasure to Him: Who has required these things at your hands?

2. How sharp Elijah was on them, v. 27. He stood by them, and patiently heard them for many hours, praying to an idol, yet with secret indignation and disdain; and, at noon, when the sun was at the hottest, and they too expecting fire, then, if ever, he upbraided them with their folly; and notwithstanding the gravity of his office, and the seriousness of the work he had before him, banters them, v. 27. Note, The worship of idols is a most ridiculous thing, and it is but justice to represent it so, and expose it to scorn. This will, by no means, justify those who ridicule the worshippers of God in Christ, because the worship is not performed just in their way. Baal's prophets were so far from being convinced and put to shame by the just reproach Elijah cast on them, that it made them the more violent, and act more ridiculously. A deceived heart having turned them aside, they could not deliver their souls by saying, Is there not a lie in our right hand?

3. How deaf Baal was to them. Elijah let them go on, till they were tired, and quite despaired of success, which was not till the time of the evening sacrifice, v. 29. During all that time, some prayed, while others prophesied, sang hymns, perhaps, to the praise of Baal, or, rather, encouraged those that were praying to proceed, telling them, Baal would answer at last; but there was no answer, nor any that regarded. Idols could do neither good nor evil; and God would not suffer the devil to work now, because the trial of his title was put on that issue by consent of parties.

V. The Baalites are forced to give up their cause; and now Elijah,

1. Fitted up an altar. He would not use theirs, that had been polluted, but, finding the ruins of an altar there, which had formerly been used in the service of the Lord, he chose to repair that, (v. 30.) to intimate that he was not about to introduce any new religion, but to revive the faith and worship of their fathers' God, and reduce them to their first love, their first works. He could not bring them to the altar at Jerusalem, unless he could have united the two kingdoms again, (which, for correction to both, God designed should not now be done,) therefore by his prophetical authority, he builds an altar on mt. Carmel, and so owns that which had formerly been built there. He repaired this altar with 12 stones, according to the number of the 12 tribes, v. 31. Though ten of the tribes were revolted to Baal, he will look on them as belonging to God still, by virtue of the ancient covenant with their fathers; and though those ten were unhappily divided from 32 And [h] with the stones he built an altar [i] in the name of the LORD: and he made a trench about the altar, as great as would contain two measures of seed.

33 And [j] he put the wood in order, and cut the bullock in pieces, and laid him on the wood, and said, [k] Fill four barrels with water, and pour it on the burnt-sacrifice, and on the wood.

34 And he said, [l] Do it the second time. And they did it the second time. And he said, Do it the third time. And they did it the third time.

35 And the water [‡] ran round about the altar, and he filled [m] the trench also with water.

36 And it came to pass, [n] at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, that Elijah the prophet came near, and said, [o] LORD God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, [p] let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, [q] and that I have done all these things at thy word.

37 [r] Hear me, O LORD, hear me, that this people may know that thou art the LORD God, and that [s] thou hast turned their heart back again.

38 [t] Then the [u] fire of the LORD fell, and consumed the burnt-sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench.

39 And when all the people saw it, [v] they fell on their faces: and they said, [x] The LORD, he is the God: the LORD, he is the God.

thereby to testify his communion with the altar at Jerusalem. He expected an answer by fire, yet came near to the altar with boldness, and feared not that fire. He addressed himself to God, as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, acting faith on God's ancient covenant, and reminding the people too of their relation both to God and to the patriarchs. He pleads the glory of God,—not sought his own, but in subserviency to God's, and for his own necessary vindication. He desired also the edification of the people.

5. God immediately answered by fire, v. 38. while he was yet speaking, the fire of the Lord fell, and not only, as at other times, (Lev. 9: 24. 1 Chr. 21: 26. 2 Chr. 7: 1.) consumed the sacrifice and the wood, in token of God's acceptance of the offering, but licked up all the water in the trench, exhaling that, and drawing it up as a vapor But this was not all; to complete the miracle, the fire consumed the stones of the altar, and the very dust, to show that it was no ordinary fire, and perhaps to intimate, that, though God accepted this occasional sacrifice from this altar, yet, for the future, they ought to demolish all the altars on their high places, and, for their constant sacrifices, make use of that at Jerusalem only. Moses' altar and Solomon's were consecrated by the fire from heaven; but this was destroyed, because no more to be used. We may well imagine the terror of guilty Ahab, and all the worshippers of Baal.

Lastly, The people, as the jury, give in their verdict at once; they fell on their faces, and all, as one man, said, 'JEHOVAH, He is the God, and not Baal; we are convinced and satisfied of it, Jehovah, He is the God,' v. 39. Whence, one would think, they should have inferred, 'If He be the God, He shall be our God, and we will serve Him only,' as Josh. 24: 24. Some, we hope, had their

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17—29. The ministers of the Lord have generally been accounted the troublers of nations, nay, even of the church, by ungodly rulers: because they oppose prevailing abuses, though sanctioned by authority, and denounce the wrath of God against impenitent sinners. Nay, they have frequently been treated as the authors of those calamities, which have come on men for persecuting them, and neglecting their warnings! But they are able to refute, and even to retort, such charges, when urged to their faces; and to show that those who forsake the commandments of the Lord, and teach others to do so, are the real troublers of the world, of the church, and of themselves and their own families: and when this is done with firmness and solemnity, as by the authority of God, it will often cause the proudest sinner to tremble; to desist from present purposes of violence, and to comply with reasonable requirements.—The cause of truth is not to be determined by vote, authority, or wealth; but God will plead his own cause, and that of his witnesses, which will countervail all disadvantages. It is right, however, to state every thing in so equitable, plain, and convincing a manner, that all may be constrained to say, 'It is well spoken,' and that the mouths of gainsayers may be stopped.—The absurdities of superstition and false religion might excite our ridicule or mockery, did not their awful effects demand our tears. The example of Elijah, in this instance, must be imitated with great caution, and only on very peculiar and evident occasions. SCOTT.

The same practice was usual among other idolaters, the priests of Bellona, the worshippers of the Syrian goddess, and of the Egyptian Isis. Tertullian, Apul. Herod. The dancing too in circles, supposed by Patr. and Gill, to be alluded to in v. 26. was a custom of the priests of Mars, (Salii,) and is still kept up by some idolaters. ED.

Verses 36, 37.

Holy zeal and intelligent good-will to Israel suggested every word, and rendered the prayer peculiarly emphatical; especially when contrasted with the unmeaning and long-continued vociferations of Baal's prophets. (26.) SCOTT.

Verses 38, 39.

Probably this fire appeared as lightning, though no cloud was seen: or it was called 'the fire of God,' from its extraordinary force, and its unparalleled effects; and especially as sent to plead the cause of God, and to expose his worthless rival to contempt. (M. R. t, u.)—It would be more perspicuous and emphatical to retain the original word, JEHOVAH, in the translation of this chapter. ID.

unto them, * Take the prophets of Baal; let not one of them escape. And they took them: and Elijah brought them down to the brook [y] Kishon, and [z] slew them there.

42 So Ahab went up to eat and to drink. And [c] Elijah went up to the top of Carmel: and [d] he cast himself down upon the earth, and [e] put his face between his knees,

43 And said to his servant, [f] Go up now, look toward the sea. And he went up, and looked, and said, There is nothing. And he said, [g] Go again seven times.

44 And it came to pass at the seventh time, that he said, Behold, there ariseth [h] a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand. And he said, Go up, say unto Ahab, ‡ Prepare thy chariot, and get thee down, that the rain stop thee not.

hearts thus turned back, but the generality of them were convinced only, not converted. Blessed are they that have not seen what they saw, yet have believed, and been wrought upon by it, more than they that saw it. Let it for ever be looked upon as a point adjudged against all pretenders, (for it was carried, upon a full hearing, against one of the most daring and threatening competitors that ever the God of Israel was affronted by,) that Jehovah He is God, God alone.

Now the prophets of Baal, as criminals and traitors, are seized, condemned, and executed, according to law, v. 40. If Jehovah be the true God, Baal is a false god, to whom these Israelites had revolted, and seduced others to the worship of him; therefore, by the express law of God, they were to be put to death, Deut. 13: 1—11. and Elijah (acting still by an extraordinary commission, which is not to be drawn into a precedent) orders them all to be slain immediately, as the troublers of the land; and Ahab himself is so terrified, for the present, with the fire from heaven, that he dares not oppose it. These were the 450 prophets of Baal; the 400 prophets of the groves, (Sidonians, so some,) though summoned, (v. 19.) yet, as it should seem, did not attend, and so escaped, which perhaps Ahab and Jezebel thought themselves happy in; but it proved they were reserved to be the instruments of Ahab's destruction, some time after, by encouraging him to go up to Ramoth-Gilead, ch. 22: 6.

V. 41—46. The reformation, though far short of being thorough, yet was so far accepted, that God, thereupon, sent rain on his land, that very evening (as it should seem) on which they did this good work, which should have confirmed them in their reformation; see Hag. 2: 18, 19.

1. Elijah sends Ahab to eat and drink, for joy that God had now accepted his works, and that rain was coming; see Eccl. 9: 7. Ahab had continued fasting all day, either religiously, it being a day of prayer, or for want of leisure, it being a day of great expectation; but now let him eat and drink, for, though others perceive no sign of it, Elijah, by faith, hears the sound of abundance of rain, v. 41. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 30—46. All religious diligence, which is not regulated according to the Word of God, as to its grand outlines, however self-denying or plausible, is unavailing: 'for he, who gathereth not with' the Savior, 'scattereth.' (Matt. 12: 29, 30.) Yet, when it is impracticable for us exactly to come up to the scriptural standard; or when we cannot have personal communion with God's people, in his more solemn ordinances: we must come as near as we can to the one, and show our fellowship with the other by such expressions as we are capable of: and the Lord will graciously accept our upright intentions, and dispense with the unavoidable irregularity.—Hypocrites expect to be heard for their much or their loud speaking; but a few words uttered in assured faith, and with fervent affections of zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men, often form 'the effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous man, which availeth much.'—The awful displays of the divine justice and holiness may terrify and convince the sinner; extort many confessions, and dispose him to external acts of obedience, while the impression lasts: but the view of these attributes, harmonizing with mercy, love, and truth, in Christ Jesus, is needful to draw the soul into self-abasement, affiance, and love. Yet the Spirit of God employs both methods, in effecting the conversion of sinners, in order and measure, as He pleases: and in our endeavors for that same blessed purpose, it is generally advisable to inform the understanding and convince the judgment first, and then to address the heart and conscience.—When sinners are deeply impressed with divine truth, they should be earnestly exhorted, without delay, to set about those self-denying duties, to which the Savior calls his disciples.—Under the Christian dispensation, indeed, we must not destroy the lives of men, even though they have deceived others to idolatrous worship. When, however, false teachers are removed, silenced, or put to shame, it exceedingly promotes the revival of true religion: and after effectual measures for public reformation have been used, we may hope for the merciful removal of public calamities.—Faith perceives things imperceptible to sense, and anticipates future and distant blessings: it therefore excites fervent prayers, in which reverence, humility, importunity, and perseverance are requisite in order to success.—The love of faithful ministers to the persons of sinners should not only be manifest to that God, who in secret hears their affectionate prayers for those, whom they most severely reprove: but they should show it by every external expression; and be ready to give honor to whom honor on any account is due; and in their private conduct to become the meanest servants to those, whom, speaking in God's name, they 'rebuke with all authority.' And He will strengthen his people for every exertion and self-denial, to which his commandments and providence call them. SCOTT.

Verse 41.

(17:1.) The idolatry of Israel having received a powerful check, and its chief abettors, the prophets of Baal, having suffered condign punishment; the prophet declared to Ahab the approach of deliverance from that awful calamity, under which the land had so long groaned; and encouraged him to go and cheerfully refresh himself. (2 Sam. 21:9—14.) It is probable, the prophet, who throughout this chapter spake and acted with heroical intrepidity, 'being strong in faith, giving glory to God,' was too sanguine in his expectations of subsequent success. Ahab's concurrence in all that he had done, or connivance at it, and the people's decided language and conduct, led him to conclude, he should, as it were, carry all before him, till the worship of Baal was wholly extirpated. This unwarranted expectation made way for the timid conduct and depressed state of mind, which is recorded in the next chapter. (19:1—14.) In this chapter he shows what man may be and do, when God upholds and strengthens him; in the next what the same man is, when left to himself. This appears, in the case of Elijah, as clearly, though in a far different way, as in the case of Samson; (Judg. 16:) and in many things it resembles what Paul records of himself. 2 Cor. 12:1—10.) SCOTT.

A sound . . . of rain.] 'It is as common in the E. to say there is the sound of rain, as in England to say there is an appearance of rain. Sometimes this refers to the thunder, as the precursor; and at other times to a blowing noise in the clouds, which indicates rain is at hand. In the vicinity of a hill or tall trees, the sound is the loudest; and Elijah was near mt. Carmel.' ROBERTS.

Verse 42.

'Who in the E. has not seen the natives thus sitting on the earth, with their faces between their knees? Persons engaged in deep meditation, in a long train of reasonings, revolving the past or anticipating the future, when in great sorrow, or fatigue, (as coolies, after a journey,) may be seen thus.' ROBERTS.

Verses 43—45.

As Elijah had no servant before he went to Zarephath; some have thought, that the widow's son, whom he had raised to life, had accompanied him. But it appears from the narrative, that he was not old enough; and it is more likely, that a young person from the schools of the prophets attended Elijah on this occasion.—The rain was no doubt equal to the necessities of the land; and formed another demonstration that JEHOVAH was the only true God. (18—20.) SCOTT.

Went up, &c. (43) The transactions of the day are supposed to have taken place at the foot of the mount, near some rivulet, whence water could still be procured. From this place, Ahab went up to some tent or residence, to take refreshment; but Elijah went up towards the summit of the mount, where the Mediterranean Sea might be clearly seen: yet he sent his servant to some higher crag or eminence to make his observations. ID.

Verse 46.

The Lord directed and strengthened Elijah, though weak with fasting and fatigue, to show this respect to Ahab; and to run as a footman before his chariot; in order to convince him, that his severe reproofs were consistent with affection and loyalty in secular matters: not

CHAP. XIX.

Ahab shows Jezebel, that Elijah had slain Baal's prophets, and she sends to Elijah, threatening to take away his life, 1, 2. He flees into the wilderness; is weary of living; but being twice strengthened with food brought by an angel, he fasts forty days, and arrives at Horeb, 3—8. There God meets him, preceded by a strong wind, an earthquake, and fire; and, speaking to him in a still small voice, commissions him to anoint Hazael, Jehu, and Elisha, 9—17. Elijah is informed that seven thousand worshippers of JEHOVAH still remain in Israel, 18. Elijah casts his mantle on Elisha, who takes leave of his friends, and follows him, 19—21.

AND [a] Ahab told Jezebel all that Elijah had done, and withal [b] how he had slain all the prophets with the sword.

vants the prophets; and yet, without a revelation, we may foresee, that when man's judgments run down like a river, God's mercy will. Rain is the river of God, Ps. 65: 9.

2. He himself retires to pray, (for though God has promised rain, he must ask it, Zech. 10: 1.) and to give thanks for God's answer by fire, now hoping for an answer by water. What he said, we are not told: but, (1.) He withdrew to the top of Carmel, which was very high and very private. Hence we read of those that hide themselves in the top of Carmel, Am. 9: 3. There he would be alone. Those who are called to appear, and act in public, for God, must yet find time to be private with Him, and keep up their converse with Him in solitude. (2.) He cast himself down, in token of humility, reverence, and importunity, i. e. abasing himself in the sense of his own meanness, now that God had thus honored him.

3. He orders his servant to bring him notice, as soon as he discerned a cloud arising out of the Mediterranean Sea, which he had a great prospect of from the top of Carmel. The sailors at this day call it Cape Carmel. Six times his servant goes to the point of the hill, and sees nothing, yet Elijah continues praying. Note, Though the answer of fervent and believing supplications does not come quickly, yet we must continue instant in prayer, and not faint or give over; for, at the end, it shall speak, and not lie.

4. A little cloud, at length, appears, no bigger than a man's hand, which presently overspreads the heavens, and waters the earth, v. 44, 45. Great blessings often arise from small beginnings, and showers of plenty from a cloud a span long. Let us therefore never despise the day of small things.

5. Elijah, hereupon, hastens Ahab home, and attends him himself. Ahab rode in his chariot, at ease and in state, v. 45. Elijah ran on foot before him. If Ahab had respected Elijah as he ought, he would have taken him into his chariot, as the eunuch did Philip, that he might honor him before the elders of Israel, and confer with him further about the reformation of the kingdom: but his corruptions got the better of his convictions, and he was glad to get clear of him, as Felix of Paul. But since Ahab invites him not to ride with him, he will run before him, (v. 46.) as one of his footmen, that he might not seem to be lifted up with the great honor God had put on him, or to abate in his civil respect to this prince, though he reproved him faithfully. God's ministers should make it appear, that how great soever they look when they deliver God's messages, yet they are far from affecting worldly grandeur: let them leave that to the kings of the earth.

CHAP. XIX. We left Elijah at the entrance of Jezreel, still appearing publicly, and all the people's eyes upon him. In this ch. we have him again absconding, and driven into obscurity, at a time when he could ill have been spared; but we are to look upon it as a punishment to Israel for the insincerity and inconstancy of their reformation. When people will not learn, it is just with God to remove their teachers into corners.

V. 1—8. I. Ahab incenses Jezebel against Elijah. That imperious woman managed king and kingdom, and did what she would. Ahab's conscience would not let him persecute Elijah, but he told Jezebel all Elijah had done, (v. 1.) not to convince, but to exasperate her. It is not said, he told her what God had done, but what Elijah had done; as if he, by some spell or charm, had brought fire from heaven, and the hand of the Lord had not been in it. Especially, he represented to her, as what would make her outrageous against him, that he had slain the prophets; the prophets of Baal he calls the prophets, as if none but they were worthy of the name. They were the gods his heart was upon, and he aggravates the slaying of them as Elijah's crime, without noticing it as a just reprisal on her for killing God's prophets, ch. 18: 4. Those who, when they cannot, for shame or fear, do mischief themselves, yet stir up others to do it, will have it laid to their charge, as if they had themselves done it.

II. Jezebel sent him a threatening message, v. 2. Note, Carnal hearts are hardened and enraged against God, by that which should convince, conquer, and bring them into subjection to Him. She swears by her gods, and raging, like one distracted, curses herself if she slay not him, without any proviso of a divine permission. Cruelty and confidence often meet in persecutors: I will pursue, I will overtake, Ex. 15: 9. But how came she to send him word of her design, and so, give him an opportunity to escape? Did she think him so daring, he would not flee; or herself able to prevent it? Or was there a special providence in it? I think, though she desired nothing more than his blood, yet, at this time, she durst not meddle with him, for fear of the people, therefore sent this message, merely to frighten him, and get him out of the way, for the present, that he might not carry on what he had begun. Her oath and imprecation, prove not at all that she really intended it, but only intended to make him believe it. The gods she sware by, could do her no harm.

III. Elijah, hereupon, in a great fright, fled for his life, it is likely by night, and came to Beer-sheba, v. 3. Shall we praise him for this? We praise him not. Where was the courage with which he had lately confronted Ahab, and all the prophets of Baal? Nay, which kept him by his sacrifice, when the fire of God fell upon it? Lord, what is man! Great faith is not always alike strong. He could not but know he might be very serviceable to Israel at this juncture, and had all the reason in the world to depend on God's protection, while he was doing God's work; yet he flies. In his former danger, God had bidden him hide himself, (ch. 17: 3.) therefore he supposed he might do it now.

IV. From Beer-sheba he went forward into the wilderness, that vast howling wilderness in which the Israelites wandered. Beer-sheba was so far from Jezreel, and within the dominion of so good a king as Jehoshaphat, that he could not but be safe there; yet, as if his fears haunted him, even there, out of the reach of danger, he cannot rest, but goes a day's journey into the desert. Yet perhaps he proceeded thither, not so much for his safety, as to be wholly retired from the world in order to a more free and intimate communion with God.

V. Being wearied with his journey, he grew cross, (like children when sleepy,) and wished he might die, v. 4. He requested for his life, (so it is in the margin,) that he might die; death is life to a good man; the death of the body, the life of the soul. Yet that was not the reason; it was not the deliberate desire of grace, as Paul's, to depart and be with Christ, but the passionate wish of his corruption, as Job's. Those that are thus was the prophet afraid of going to Jezreel, where Jezebel was; though he did not come into her presence. It does not appear, that either Ahab, or his attendants, or the inhabitants of Jezreel, offered him any refreshment, or hospitably entertained him. His reception at least was discouraging. SCOTT.

Verses 3, 4.

It seems, Elijah fled from Jezreel the very night after the sacrifice, and the fire from heaven, and the abundant rain given in answer to his prayers; and before he had time suitably to refresh himself after the fatigues of the preceding day. Beer-sheba, in the south of Judah, was at a considerable distance from Jezreel, in the lot of Issachar: (Josh. 19:18.) yet he travelled with all speed till he came thither.—He had passed through the whole kingdom of Judah, where doubtless pious Jehoshaphat would have welcomed and protected him.—When Elijah said, 'I am no better than my fathers,' he seems to have referred to some pre-intimations given him of his translation. 6 And he looked, and, behold, there [n] was a cake baken on the coals, and a cruse of water at his [*] head. And he did eat and drink, and laid him down again.

7 And the [o] angel of the LORD came again the second time, and touched him, and said, Arise and eat: [p] because the journey is too great for thee.

8 And he arose, and did eat and drink, and went [q] in the strength of that meat, [r] forty days and forty nights, unto [s] Horeb the mount of God.

9 And he came thither [t] unto a cave, and lodged there; and, behold, the word of the LORD came to him, and he said unto him, [u] What doest thou here, Elijah?

forward to die, are not in the fittest frame for it. Jezebel has sworn his death, therefore he, in a fret, prays for it, yet with this difference, he wishes to die by the hand of the Lord. He would rather die in the wilderness, than as Baal's prophets died, according to Jezebel's threatening, (v. 2.) lest the worshippers of Baal triumph, and blaspheme the God of Israel, whom they will think themselves too hard for, if they can run down his advocate. Can that great and gallant spirit shrink thus? God thus left him to himself, to show, that when he was bold and strong, it was in the Lord, and the power of his might, but of himself he was no better than his fathers, or brethren.

VI. God, by an angel, fed him. How much better God deals with his froward children than they deserve! Elijah, in a fit of despondency, wished to die; God needed him not, yet designed further to honor him, therefore sent an angel to keep him alive. Our case would be bad sometimes, if God should take us at our word, and grant our foolish, passionate requests. Having prayed he might die, he laid down and slept, (v. 5.) wishing to die in his sleep; but he is awakened, and finds himself not only well provided with bread and water, (v. 6.) but, which was more, attended by an angel, who guarded him when he slept, and twice called him to his food when it was ready, v. 5, 7. He needed not complain of the unkindnesses of men, when it was thus made up by the ministration of angels. Wherever God's children are, as they are still on their Father's ground, so they are still under their Father's eye and care. They may lose themselves in a wilderness, but God has not left them; there they may look at Him that lives, and sees them, as Hagar, Gen. 16: 13.

Lastly, He is carried, in the strength of this meat, to Horeb, the mount of God, v. 8. Thither the Spirit of the Lord led him, probably, beyond his own intention. The angel bade him eat the second time, because of the greatness of the journey before him, v. 7. Note, God knows what He designs us for, though we do not, what services, what trials; and will take care for us, when we, for want of foresight, cannot for ourselves, that we be furnished for them with grace sufficient. See how many different ways God took to keep Elijah alive; fed him by ravens, with multiplied meals—then by an angel—and now, to show that man lives not by bread alone, he kept him alive 40 days without meat, not resting and sleeping, which might make him the less to crave sustenance, but continually traversing the mazes of the desert, a day for a year of Israel's wanderings; yet he neither needs food, nor desires it. The place, no doubt, reminds him of the manna, and encourages him to hope that God would sustain him here, and, in due time, bring him hence, as he did Israel, though, like him, fretful and distrustful.

V. 9—18. Here is,

I. Elijah housed in a cave at mount Horeb, called the mount of God, because on it God formerly manifested his glory; perhaps, the same cave, or cleft of a rock, Moses was hidden in, when the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed his name, Ex. 34: 6. What Elijah proposed to himself, in coming to lodge here, I cannot conceive, unless either to indulge his melancholy, or satisfy his curiosity, and assist his faith and devotion, with the sight of that famous place where the law was given, and so many great things were done, and hoping to meet God Himself, there where Moses met Him; or, in token of his abandoning his people Israel, who hated to be reformed; and so it agrees with Jeremiah's wish, (Jer. 9: 2.) and was a bad omen of God's forsaking them: or, it was because he thought he could not be safe elsewhere; and to this instance of the hardships this good man was reduced to, the apostle refers, Heb. 11: 38. They wandered in deserts and in mountains, in dens and caves of the earth.

II. God's visit to him there, and inquiry: The word of the Lord came to him. We cannot go any whither, to be out of the reach of God's eye, his arm, and his word. Ps. 139: 7, &c. God will take care of his out-casts; He will find, own, and gather them with everlasting loving-kindnesses John saw the visions of the Almighty, when in banishment in Patmos, Rev. 1: 9.

The question God puts to him, is, What doest thou here, Elijah? v. 9. and again, v. 13. This is a reproof. Such cowardice had been more excusable in another, and not so bad an example Besides, in the retirement to which God sent him, ch. 17. he was a blessing to a poor widow at Sarepta, but here he had no opportunity of doing good. Note, It concerns us often to inquire, whether we be in our place, and in the way of usefulness, and of duty.

III. The account he gives of himself v. 10, 14. 1. He excuses his retreat, and desires it may not be imputed to his want of zeal for reformation, but to his despair of success. God knew, and his own conscience witnessed for him, that as long as there was any hope of doing good, he had been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts; but now that he had labored in vain, and all his endeavors were to no purpose, he thought it time to give up the cause, and mourn for what he could not mend. 2. He complains of the people, their obstinacy in sin, and the height of impiety they were got to. This the apostle calls his making intercession against Israel, Rom. 11: 2, 3. He had often been, of choice, their advocate, but now is necessitated to be their accuser, before God. Thus, (John 5: 45.) There is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. Those are truly miserable, that have the testimony and prayers of God's prophets against them. 3. He charges them with having forsaken God's covenant; they retained circumcision, the sign and seal of it, yet had quitted his worship and service, which was the intention of it. Those who neglect God's ordinances, do really forsake his covenant. He charges them with having thrown down his altars; meaning private altars, which, though separate, being erected and attended by those that sincerely aimed at the glory of God, and served Him faithfully, were excused from the charge of schism. But this was not all; They have slain thy prophets with the sword, who, it is probable, ministered at those altars. Jezebel, a foreigner, did it, (ch. 18: 4.) but it is charged on the body of the people, because the generality of them were consenting to their death, and pleased with it. 4. He gives the reason why he retired. (1.) He could not appear to any purpose. 'They all said, The Lord He is God, but none of them would stand by me, or offer to shelter me.' Despair of success hinders many a good enterprise. None are willing to venture alone; forgetting that those are not alone, who have God with them. (2.) He could not appear with safety; 'I had better spend life in useless solitude,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. No miracles or judgments can finally stop the fury of persecutors: though intimidated for a season, when they have respite, and leisure to confer with one another, they grow desperate in proportion as they have been baffled and mortified. (Ex. 8: 15. 14: 5—9. Acts 4: 13—22. 5: 17—28.) Nay, such diabolic enmity can inhabit the breasts of females, and has sometimes raged in them with peculiar vehemence! (Notes, Matt. 14: 3—11.)—Mad passions often defeat their own end, and furious threats prevent the execution of determined malice.—The most eminent believers cannot exercise even those graces, which most distinguish their characters, without the immediate assistance of God. The Lord, however, bears with his faithful servants, notwithstanding their infirmities; and preserves them for every service which He has allotted them, whatever they wish or fear. Indeed, when they flee from the path of duty, He will meet and rebuke them, but He will not forsake them. SCOTT.

All these effects were no doubt produced by the ministration of angels.—Miracles in the first ages of Christianity called men's attention to the preaching of the Gospel, which, as a still, small voice, was the power of God to salvation to thousands and millions.—The Lord's renewed inquiry, 'What doest thou here?' shows, that Elijah did not than lose it in a fruitless endeavor to reform those that hate reform.'

IV. God's manifestation of Himself to him. Did he come hither to meet God? He shall find God will not fail to meet him. Moses was put into the cave, when God's glory passed before him; but Elijah was called out of it, to stand on the mount before the Lord, v. 11. He saw no manner of similitude, any more than Israel did, when God talked to them in Horeb: but he heard a strong wind, and saw the terrible effects of it; he felt the shock of an earthquake; saw an eruption of fire, v. 12. and, at last, he perceived a still small voice, in which the Lord was, i. e. by which He spake to him, and not out of the wind, or the earthquake, or the fire. Those struck an awe on him, awakened his attention, and inspired humility and reverence; but God chose to make known his mind to him in soft whispers, not in those dreadful sounds. Elijah hid his face, ashamed that he should have been such a coward as to shrink from his duty, when he had such a God of power to stand by him in it. The wind, and earthquake, and fire, did not make him cover his face, but the still voice did. Gracious souls are more affected by the tender mercies of the Lord, than by his terrors. The whole here seems to refer to the discoveries God formerly made of Himself at this place to Moses. Then there was a tempest, earthquake, and fire; (Heb. 12: 18.) but when God would show Moses his glory, He proclaimed his goodness; and so here, He was the Word, was in the still small voice. Then the law was thus given to Israel, with the appearances of terror first, and then with a voice of words; and Elijah, being now called to revive that law, especially the first two commandments of it, is here taught how to manage; he must not only awaken and terrify the people with amazing signs, like the earthquake and fire, but must endeavor, with a still, small voice, to convince and persuade them, and not forsake them, when he should do that. Faith comes by hearing the Word of God: miracles but make way for it. Now God speaks with a still, small voice, the dread of which should not make us afraid; see Heb. 12: 18, &c.

V. The orders God gives him to execute. He repeated the question put before, 'What doest thou here? This is not a place for thee now.' Elijah answers, (v. 14.) in complaint of Israel's apostasy, and the ruin of religion among them. To this God replies, and sends him back with directions to appoint Hazael king of Syria, (v. 15.) Jehu king of Israel, and Elisha his successor in the eminency of the prophetical office; (v. 16.) which is intended as a prediction, that by these God would chastise the degenerate Israelites, plead his own cause among them, and avenge the quarrel of his covenant, v. 17. Elijah complained that the wickedness of Israel was unpunished. 'Well,' saith God, 'be content, it is all in good time, the persons are pitched on, and shall

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 10—14. No former zeal, boldness, or usefulness, will excuse present neglects: yet we are most apt to boast of what we have been and done, when most remiss in present duty! The zealous minister often concludes he can do no good, because he cannot do all he hoped for: and when he witnesses much evil in the church, or in that part in which he labors, he often imagines matters to be much worse than they really are. But on reflection, this very experience may explain to us that rebellion of others, which so disconcerts us; and teach us gentleness and long-suffering, without disdaining or despairing of the worst of sinners.—The blessing is from the Lord; and He often works most effectually when proper means are used, with quiet assiduity and perseverance, without any of that bustle and vehemence which excite the public attention.—The Word of God also is indeed 'like a fire, and a hammer, that breaketh the rocks in pieces;' and the whole of it should be preached with zealous plainness and faithfulness: but 'the ministration of condemnation,' and the awful terrors of eternal vengeance, only precede and make way for 'the ministration of righteousness,' and the sweet Gospel of Christ, attended by urgent persuasions, melting expostulations, and tender invitations, in which the Lord chiefly comes to seal our hearts for Himself; and without this little will be done.—We shall do well often to imagine, that we hear the Lord inquire, 'What doest thou here?' In scenes of worldly dissipation, in trifling company, in riotous feastings, or where unlawful traffic is carrying on, the Christian can have no good answer ready: nor can the minister, if engrossed by needless, worldly business, by trifling studies, or by the pursuits of ambition, preferment, pleasure, or reputation, to the neglect of the important duties of his calling. Nay, if we are at home, when we should be in the pulpit; asleep, when we should be at work; or in company, when we should be engaged in prayer and meditation, or reading the Scriptures; such a question must confound us. In short, every station has its proper duties, and every portion of time its proper work, and we should frequently call ourselves to account, whether we be in our place and proper employment, as the duty of the season requires.

Verses 15—17.

As the prophet was ordered to go on the way to the wilderness of Damascus, it seems probable he went directly towards Syria, and meeting with Hazael, anointed him; though this is not recorded. Jehu was afterwards anointed by a prophet sent by Elisha; (2 K. 9:1—10.) and perhaps Elisha was anointed by Elijah, when called to be his successor. Some, however, think the expression is not always to be taken literally; but merely as an intimation, that God would advance the persons spoken of, to the stations assigned, and qualify them for the work to be performed by them. (Ps. 105:15. Is. 45.1.)—Jehu executed vengeance on Jezebel and Ahab's posterity, and the priests and worshippers of Baal: Hazael through his whole reign wasted and destroyed the people of Israel: and, at Elisha's word, the Lord took vengeance on those, who would not attend to the instructions of his prophets. The order of time, in these judgments, seem not to be exactly marked, but the certainty of the events. (M. R. s—x.)—God was infinitely more jealous for his own glory, than Elijah could be for it; and He would by no means desert his cause, or suffer his enemies to triumph, as the prophet feared: but, before He proceeded to vengeance, He would gather in his chosen people, and separate a remnant from among the idolaters. SCOTT.

Verse 18.

The Lord 'had reserved for Himself' 7000 Israelites, who had neither bowed their knees to Baal, nor kissed his image, nor in any way been induced to worship him. (M. R. y—a. Hos. 13:2.) These, though few in comparison, were a considerable number in themselves, and far more than Elijah supposed.—As Ahab and Jezebel aimed to establish the worship of Baal, we may suppose the golden calves were neglected; and that these persons as conscientiously adhered to the worship of JEHOVAH, as the times would admit: they would, however, greatly need further instruction and encouragement. Others might be recovered from idolatry; and the rising generation might be rescued from its contagion. So that there was a great deal of useful employment now be nominated. When Hazael comes to be king of Syria, he shall make bloody work among the people, (2 K. 8: 12.) and so correct them for their idolatry.' 'When Jehu comes to be king of Israel, he shall make bloody work with the royal family, and shall utterly destroy the house of Ahab, that set up and maintained idolatry.' 'Elisha, while thou art on earth, shall strengthen thy hands; and when thou art gone, shall carry on thy work, and be a remaining witness against the apostasy of Israel, and even he shall slay the children of Beth-el, that idolatrous city.' Note, The wicked are reserved to judgment. Evil pursues sinners, and there is no escaping it; to attempt an escape, is but to run from one sword's point on another. It is a great comfort to good men, and good ministers, to think that God will never want instruments to do his work, in his time, but when they are gone, others shall be raised up to carry it on.

VI. The comfortable information God gives him of the number of Israelites who retained their integrity, though he thought he was left alone, v. 18. Note, 1. In times of the greatest degeneracy and apostasy, God has always had, and will have, a remnant faithful to Him. The apostle mentions this answer of God to Elijah, (Rom. 11: 4.) and applies it to his own day, when the Jews generally rejected the Gospel, v. 5. 2. It is God's work to preserve that remnant, and distinguish them from the rest; it is therefore said to be a remnant, according to the election of grace. 3. It is but a little remnant, in comparison with the degenerate race; what are 7,000 to the thousands of Israel? Yet when those of every age come together, they will be found many more, 12,000 sealed out of each tribe, Rev. 7: 4. 4. God's faithful ones are often his hidden ones, (Ps. 83: 3.) and the visible church scarcely visible; the wheat lost in the chaff, and the gold in the dross, till the sifting, refining, separating, day comes. 5. The Lord knows them that are his, though we do not; He sees them in secret. 6. There are more good people in the world, than some wise and holy men think.

V. 19—21. Elisha was named last in the orders God gave Elijah; but is first called, for by him the other two were to be called. Elijah is far from being jealous of his successor, and rejoices to think he shall leave the work of God in such good hands. Concerning the call of Elisha, observe,

1. It was a surprising call: Elijah found him by divine direction, or, perhaps, he was before acquainted with him, and knew where to find him, v. 19. Though a great man, (as appears by his feast, v. 21.) master of the ground, oxen, and servants, yet he did not think it any disparagement to him, to follow his business himself, and not only to inspect his servants, but himself to lay his hand to the plough. Idleness is no man's honor, nor husbandry any man's disgrace. An honest calling in the world, does not at all put us out of the way of our heavenly calling. Elisha inquired not after Elijah, but was anticipated with this call. We love God, and choose Him, because He chose us, and loved us, first.

2. It was a powerful call: Elijah did but cast his mantle on him, (v. 19.) in token of friendship, that he would take him under his care and tuition, or, in token of his being clothed with the spirit of Elijah; now he put some of his honor on him, as Moses on Joshua; (Num. 27: 20.) but when Elijah went to heaven, he had the mantle entire, 2 K. 2: 13. And immediately he left the oxen to go as they would, and ran after Elijah, assuring him that he would follow him presently, v. 20. An invisible hand touched his heart, and unaccountably inclined him, by a secret power, without any external persuasions, to quit his husbandry, and give himself to the ministry. It is in a day of power, that Christ's subjects are willing; nor would any come to Christ, unless they were thus drawn. Elisha came to a resolution presently, but begged a little time, not to ask leave, but only to take leave, of his parents. This was not an excuse for delay, like his that desired he might bid them farewell that were at home; but only a reservation of the respect and duty he owed his father and mother. Elijah bade him go back, and do it, he would not hinder him: nay, if he would, he might go back, and not return, for any thing he had done to him.

3. It was a pleasant and acceptable call, as appears by the farewell feast he made, v. 21. Yet he not only quitted all the comforts of his father's house, but exposed himself to the malignity of Jezebel, and her party; it was a discouraging time for prophets to set out in. A man that had consulted with flesh and blood, would not be fond of Elijah's mantle, nor willing to wear his coat; yet Elisha, cheerfully, and with great satisfaction, leaves all, to accompany him. Thus Matthew made a great feast, when he left the receipt of custom to follow Christ.

4. It was an effectual call: Elijah did not stay for him, but left him to his own choice, and he soon arose, went after him, and not only associated with him, but ministered to him, as his servitor, poured water on his hands, 2 K. 3: 11.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—21. It is not easy to convince men of their faults, and silence their excuses or boastings: and, whilst the Lord encourages his servants under their difficulties, He sends them back to their proper work, ashamed of their timidity and neglect; and then He gives them both helpers and success.—Those who duly understand the importance of the sacred ministry, will renounce every other honor, pleasure, and interest for the sake of it, though called to labor in the midst of hardships, poverty, and persecution.—Zeal for the glory of God and the salvation of souls will subordinate, though it will not extinguish, natural affections. (Matt. 10: 37—39.) The work of the ministry requires the whole man: and when such persons are employed, as have not been regularly educated for it, they are especially concerned to attend the instructions, frequent the company, and copy the examples, of aged and approved ministers: and 'no man having set his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.' (P. O. Matt. 4: 12—25.—Matt. 8: 21, 22.) In difficult times, helpers of inferior abilities may be a great comfort to the discouraged servants of God: and this service is carried on to advantage, when different ministers concur, from the same principles, to seek the same great end of his glory in the salvation of souls. May 'the Lord of the harvest send forth many such laborers into his harvest!' Amen. (Note, Matt. 9: 36—38.)

This might occur after Elijah's return from the wilderness of Damascus, or in his journey thither.—Elisha was employed in husbandry, and his father seems to have been a man of wealth. Whilst he was employed in his labor, Elijah cast his mantle on him, which was intended, and understood, as a call to him to follow and attend upon him. (2 K. 2:13, 14.) SCOTT.

CHAP. XX.

Ben-hadad king of Syria, not satisfied with Ahab's submission, leads a powerful army against Samaria, and wars against it, 1—12. Ahab, directed by a prophet, gains a complete victory over him, 13—21. A prophet warns Ahab to prepare for another assault, 22. The Syrians come again, the next year, with very great preparations; and are opposed by a very small company, 23, 27. A prophet assures Ahab of victory, because the Syrians thought JEHOVAH the God of the hills, but not of the valleys, 28. The Syrians are smitten with immense slaughter, and Ben-hadad flees and hides himself, 29, 30. He submissively sues to Ahab, who makes a league with him, 31—34. A prophet, by a parable, leads Ahab to condemn himself, and then denounces the judgment of God against him for his unseasonable lenity, 35—43.

AND [a] Ben-hadad the king of Syria gathered all his host together; and there were [b] thirty and two kings with him, [c] and horses and chariots: and he went up and [d] besieged Samaria, and warred against it.

2 And [e] he sent messengers to Ahab king of Israel into the city, and said unto him, Thus saith Ben-hadad,

3 Thy [f] silver and thy gold is mine; thy wives also and thy children, even the goodliest, are mine.

4 And the king of Israel answered and said, My lord, O king, according to thy saying, [g] I am thine, and all that I have.

5 And the messengers came again, and said, Thus speaketh Ben-hadad, saying, Although I have sent unto thee, saying, Thou shalt deliver me thy silver, and thy gold, and thy wives, and thy children;

6 Yet I will send my servants unto thee to-morrow, about this time, [h] and they shall search thine house, and the houses of thy servants: and it shall be, that whatsoever is [*] pleasant in thine eyes, they shall put it in their hand, and take it away.

7 Then the king of Israel called [i] all the elders of the land, and said, [j] Mark, I pray you, and see how this man [k] seeketh mischief: for he sent unto me for my wives, and for my children, and for my silver, and for my gold, and I † denied him not.

8 And all the elders and all the people said unto him, Hearken not unto him, nor consent.

9 Wherefore he said unto the messengers of Ben-hadad, Tell my lord the king, All that thou didst send for to thy servant at the first I will do; but this thing I may not do. And the messengers departed, and brought him word again.

10 And Ben-hadad sent unto him, and said, [l] The gods do so unto me, and more also, [m] if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that ‡ follow me.

Chap. XX. This ch. is the history of a war between Ben-hadad king of Syria, and Ahab king of Israel, in which Ahab was once, and again, victorious. We read nothing of Elijah or Elisha in all this story; Jezebel's rage, it is probable, was abated, and the persecution of the prophets began to cool; which gleam of peace Elijah improves; he appears not at court, but, being told how many thousand good people there were in Israel, more than he thought of, employs himself, as we may suppose, in founding religious schools, or colleges, of prophets, in several parts of the country, to be nurseries of religion, that they may help to reform the nation, when the throne and court would not be reformed: while they were thus busied, God favored the nation with the successes we here read of, which were the more remarkable, because obtained against Ben-hadad king of Syria, whose successor, Hazael, was ordained to be a scourge to Israel; they must shortly suffer by the Syrians, and yet now triumph over them, that, if possible, they might be led to repentance by the goodness of God.

V. 1—11. Here is, I. Ben-hadad's threat, v. 1. What the ground of the quarrel was, we are not told; covetousness and ambition were the principle, which would never want some pretence or other. David, in his time, had quite subdued the Syrians, and made them tributaries, but Israel's apostasy makes them formidable again Asa had tempted the Syrians to invade Israel once, (ch. 15: 18—20.) and now they did it of their own accord: it is dangerous bringing a foreign force into a country, posterity may pay dear for it. Ben-hadad had with him 32 kings, who were either tributaries, or confederates; how little did the title of king look, when all these poor, petty governors pretended to it!

II. The treaty between these two kings; surely Israel's Defence was departed, else the Syrians could not have marched so readily, and with so little opposition, to Samaria, the head and heart of the country, a city lately built, and therefore, we may suppose, not well fortified, but like to fall quickly into the hands of the invaders; both sides are aware of this, therefore,

1. Ben-hadad's proud spirit sends Ahab a very insolent demand, v. 2, 3. that Ahab become his vassal, nay, not only pay tribute out of what he has, but make over his title to Ben-hadad, and hold all at his will, even his wives and children, the goodliest of them: the manner of expression is designed to gall.

2. Ahab's poor spirit sends Ben-hadad a very disgraceful submission; general indeed, he cannot mention particulars in his surrender, with so much pleasure as Ben-hadad in his demand, but effectual, I am thine, all that I have, v. 4. See the effect of sin: it provokes God to depart, brings men into straits, and puts them out of divine protection; if God do not rule us, our enemies shall; a rebel to God, is a slave to all besides. Ahab had prepared his silver and gold for Baal, (Hos. 2: 8.) justly therefore is it taken from him; such an alienation amounts to a forfeiture. If he had not, by sin, wronged his own conscience, and set that against him, he could not have made such a mean surrender; guilt dispirits men, and makes them cowards; he knew Baal could not help, and had no reason to think God would, therefore is content to buy his life on any terms; he will rather live a beggar, than not die a prince.

3. Ben-hadad's proud spirit rises, on his submission, and becomes yet more insolent and imperious, v. 5, 6. Ahab had laid his all at his feet, expecting one king would use another generously, that his acknowledgment of Ben-hadad's sovereignty would have contented him; the honor was sufficient for the present, and he might, hereafter, make use of it if he saw cause; but this will not serve: He is as covetous as he is proud, he will not so much as lend Ahab the use of his own goods above a day longer. He is as spiteful as he is haughty; he will not come himself, but send his servants to insult the prince, and rifle the palace; nay, to vex Ahab the more, they shall be ordered not only to take what they please, but especially whatever Ahab is in a particular manner fond of. We are often crossed in that which we most doat on; and that proves least safe, which is most dear He is as unreasonable as he is unjust, he will construe the surrender Ahab made for himself, as made for all his subjects too, and plunder them at discretion. Blessed be God for peace and prosperity, and that what we have, we can call our own.

4. Ahab's poor spirit begins to rise, too, on his growing insolence; and if not bold, yet becomes desperate, he will rather hazard his life than give up all thus. Now he takes advice of his privy-council, though he speaks but poorly, (v. 7.) owns he had truckled before, and would have them advise what he should do in this strait; they speak bravely, v. 8. promising, no doubt, to stand by him in the refusal. Yet he expresses himself very modestly in his denial, v. 9. It was a mortification to Ben-hadad, that even such an abject spirit as Ahab's, dares deny him; yet it should seem by his manner of expressing himself, that he durst not have done it, if his people had not animated him.

5. Ben-hadad proudly swears the ruin of Samaria: the threatening waves of his wrath, meeting with this check, rage and foam, and make a noise; in his fury, he imprecates the impotent revenge of his gods: and so confident is he of success, that the taking of Samaria will be as easy as the taking up of a handful of dust; all shall be carried away, even the ground on which the city stands. Thus confident is his pride, thus cruel his malice; this pre-

NOTES.

Chap. XX. V. 1. Ben-hadad signifies The son of Hadad; (11:14—22.) yet he is said to have been 'the son of Tabrimon, the son of Hezion.' (15:18.)—Perhaps Hadad was his father, and Tabrimon and Hezion his more remote ancestors.—The 32 kings were petty princes of the adjacent countries, who were either vassals or allies to the king of Syria.—Ben-hadad had probably wasted the country before he besieged Samaria.—The late terrible famine must have diminished the number of the Israelites, by death and emigration, almost beyond calculation: and, by the righteous judgment of God, the remainder were so disaffected to Ahab, or so dismayed by Ben-hadad, that they had retired or fled; thus they left the capital city in a very defenceless condition. 11 And the king of Israel answered and said, Tell him, [n] Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off.

12 And it came to pass, when Ben-hadad heard this [*] message, as he was [o] drinking, he and the kings in the [†] pavilions, that he said unto his servants, [‡] Set yourselves in array. And they set themselves in array against the city.

13 And, behold, there [§] came a prophet unto Ahab king of Israel, saying, Thus saith the LORD, [p] Hast thou seen all this great multitude? behold, I will deliver it into thine hand this day; [q] and thou shalt know that I am the LORD.

14 And Ahab said, By whom? And he said, Thus saith the LORD, Even by the [‖] young men of the princes of the provinces. Then he said, Who shall [¶] order the battle? And he answered, Thou.

15 Then he numbered the young men of the princes of the provinces, and they were [r] two hundred and thirty-two: and after them he numbered all the people, even all the children of Israel, being [s] seven thousand.

16 And they went out at noon. But [t] Ben-hadad was drinking himself drunk in the pavilions, he and the kings, the thirty and two kings that helped him.

17 And [u] the young men of the princes of the provinces went out first; and Ben-hadad sent out, and they told him, saying, There are men come out of Samaria.

18 And he said, [v] Whether they be come out for peace, take them alive; or whether the be come out for war, take them alive.

19 So these young men of the princes of the provinces came out of the city, and the army which followed them.

20 And [x] they slew every one his man: and [y] the Syrians fled; and Israel pursued them: and Ben-hadad the king of Syria [z] escaped on an horse, with the horsemen.

[Practical Observations.]

pares him to be ruined, though such a prince and such a people are unworthy to see him ruined.

6. Ahab sends him a decent rebuke to his assurance; dares not defy his menaces, only reminds him of the uncertain turns of war, v. 11. This was one of the wisest words Ahab ever spake, and is a good item or memento to us all: it is folly to boast before, of any day, since we know not what it may bring forth; (Prov. 27: 1.) but especially of a day of battle. It is impolitic to despise an enemy; and to be too sure of victory is the way to be beaten. Apply it to our spiritual conflicts; Peter fell by his confidence: while we are here, we are but girding on the harness, therefore must never boast as though we had put it off. Happy is the man that feareth always, and is never off his watch.

V. 12—21. The treaty between the besiegers and the besieged being broken off abruptly, we have here an account of the battle that ensued immediately.

I. The Syrians, the besiegers, had their directions from a drunken king, who gave orders over his cups, as he was drinking, (v. 12.) and this, at noon. Drunkenness is a sin, which armies and their officers have, of old, been addicted to: security and sensuality went together in the old world, and in Sodom; Luke 17: 26, &c. and so here, Ben-hadad's drunkenness was the forerunner of his fall, as Belshazzar's was, Dan. 5. He orders the town to be invested, the engines fixed, and every thing got ready for a general attack, (v. 12.) but stirs not from his drunken club to see it done; Wo unto thee, O land, when thy king is such a child. When the besieged made a sally, he gave orders (v. 18.) not to kill them, which might have been done more easily and safely, but to seize them, which gave them an opportunity of killing the aggressors; so imprudent was he, as well as unjust, in ordering them to be taken prisoners, even if they came for peace, and to renew the treaty.

II. The Israelites, the besieged, had their directions from an inspired prophet, one of the prophets of the Lord, whom Ahab had hated and persecuted: And behold, a prophet, even one, drew near to the king of Israel; so it may be read, v. 13. Behold, and wonder, that God should send a prophet with a kind and gracious message to so wicked a prince; but He did it, 1. For his people Israel's sake, who, though wickedly degenerated, were the seed of Abraham his friend, and Jacob his chosen, the children of the covenant, not yet cast off. 2. That He might magnify his mercy, in doing good to one so evil and unthankful; might either bring him to repentance, or leave him the more inexcusable. 3. That He might mortify the pride of Ben-hadad, and check his insolence: Ahab's idolatry shall be punished hereafter, but Ben-hadad's haughtiness now; God resists the proud.

This prophet is not named, for he spake in God's name; but when he said, Thus saith the Lord, we may suppose Ahab began to tremble, expecting a message of wrath; yet he is revived, when it proves a gracious one. He is reminded of the use he must make of this blessed turn of affairs. God's foretelling a thing so very unlikely, proved it was his own doing. The prophet instructs him what to do to gain the victory. 1. He must sally out, and surprise the enemy in their trenches. 2. The persons employed must be the young men of the princes of the provinces, the pages, the footmen, few in number, unacquainted with war, and the unlikeliest men that could be thought of, for such a bold attempt; these must do it, that while Ben-hadad's boasting is punished, Ahab's might be prevented and precluded, and the excellency of the power be of God. 3. Ahab must himself so far testify his confidence in the word of God, as to command in person, though, in the eye of reason, he exposed himself to the utmost danger by it; it is fit that those who have the benefit of God's promises, should venture on them. Yet, 4. He is allowed to use what forces he had at hand, to follow the blow. All he had in Samaria, or within call, were but 7000 men; v. 15. the same number, observe, with theirs that had not bowed the knee to Baal, (ch. 19: 18.) though, it is likely, not the same men.

III. The issue was accordingly; the proud Syrians were beaten, the poor, despised Israelites more than conquerors; the young men alarmed the Syrians, just at noon, at high dinner time [at least this was the hour of dinner among the ancient Egyptians], supported by what little force they had, v. 16. Ben-hadad despised them, at first, (v. 18.) but at length, affrighted, he mounted

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21. The indignation of the Lord will surely weaken and dispirit sinners: and those nations especially, which have been favored with the light of revelation, will be brought low for their iniquity, when they forsake the service of God.—Ungodly men delight to insult over the fallen; success increases their pride and insolence; and thus they too are prepared for vengeance.—Those, who most daringly rebel against God, are often mere cowards when assaulted by their fellow creatures.—Men will part with their most pleasant things, to save their temporal lives: yet they lose their souls, and incur everlasting misery, rather than bestow any labor, or give up any pleasure or interest, to prevent it! (Matt. 16: 24—28. P. O. 21—28.)—Boasting and menacing language generally betrays a weak and foolish mind, exposes men to cutting rebukes, and terminates in abject meanness and disgrace.—The Lord will secure his own glory, and take care of his own people, notwithstanding the wickedness of the great, or the many: He will leave every impenitent sinner without excuse; and He delights to save by unlikely instruments, that his own power may be the more conspicuous.—The Lord inspires counsel and courage, or sends infatuation and dismay, as He pleases: so that the battle is not to the strong; but all calculations are strangely proved erroneous, when this secret influence is not taken into the account. I. Ahab is admonished by a prophet to prepare for another war, v. 22. It should seem, he was now secure; those that are careless of their souls, are often as careless of their outward affairs; but the prophet (to whom God made known the counsels of the Syrians) told him, they would renew their attempt, at the return of the year, hoping to retrieve their honor, and be avenged. He therefore bade him strengthen himself, and be ready. God had decreed the end, but Ahab must use the means, else he tempts God. The enemies of God's Israel, though they may take time to breathe, yet are restless in their malice. It concerns us always to expect assaults from our spiritual enemies, and therefore to mark and see what we do.

II. Ben-hadad is advised by those about him concerning the next campaign.

1. To change his ground, v. 23. They take it for granted it was not Israel, but Israel's gods, that beat them; (so great a regard was then universally had to invisible powers;) but they speak very ignorantly of Jehovah—that He was many, whereas he is One,—that He was their God only, a local deity, peculiar to that nation, whereas He is the Creator and Ruler of all the world—and that He was a God of the hills only, because David, had said, I will lift up mine eyes to the hills from whence cometh my help, and that his foundation was in the holy mountain; and much was said of his holy hill, supposing Him altogether such a one as their imaginary deities: thus vain were they in their imaginations concerning God.

2. They advise him to change his officers; (v. 24, 25.) not to employ the kings, who were commanders by birth, but captains rather, who were commanders by merit; let every man be employed in that which he is brought up to, and used to, and preferred to that which he is fit for. Syria, it seems, was rich and populous, when it could furnish recruits sufficient, after so great a defeat, horse for horse, chariot for chariot.

III. Both armies take the field: Ben-hadad, with his Syrians, near Aphek, in the tribe of Asher, a city, it is likely, in his own possession, one of those his father had won, (v. 34.) and the country about, flat and level, fit for his purpose, v. 26. Ahab, with his forces, at some distance over against them, v. 27. The disproportion of numbers was very remarkable, v. 27.

IV. Ahab is encouraged to fight. A man of God is sent to tell him, that this numerous army should all be delivered into his hand, (v. 28.) but not for his sake; he was utterly unworthy: God would not do it, because Ahab had praised God, or prayed to Him, (we do not read that he did either,) but because the Syrians had blasphemed God, who is Lord of all hosts, not only in hills and valleys, but in heaven and earth, which they are willingly ignorant of; and shall be undeceived, at the expense of that vast army which is so much their pride and confidence.

V. After the armies had faced one another seven days, (the Syrians, it is likely, boasting, and the Israelites trembling,) they engaged, and the Syrians were totally routed; 100,000 slain in the field of battle, (v. 29.) and 27,000, under the walls of Aphek, probably, overthrown by an earthquake, and, the cities of Canaan being walled up to heaven, it reached a great way, and they were all either killed, hurt, or overwhelmed with dismay. Ben-hadad, who thought his city Aphek should have held out against the conquerors, finding it thus unwalled, and the remnant of his forces dispirited and dispersed, had nothing but secrecy to rely on for safety, therefore hid himself in a chamber within a chamber.

V. 31—43. Here is what followed the victory.

I. Ben-hadad's tame and mean submission; even in his inner chamber he fears, and would, if he could, flee further, though none pursues; his servants, seeing him and themselves reduced to the last extremity, advise a surrender at discretion, and make themselves prisoners and petitioners to Ahab for their lives, v. 31. Their inducements of the Syrians, so dismayed them, that they yielded the army an easy and decisive victory. (1 Sam. 14:11—15.) SCOTT.

Verses 23—25.

They had probably heard, that JEHOVAH had displayed his glory from mt. Sinai: the temple was built on mt. Zion; Samaria was situated on a hill; and the people loved to sacrifice on high places: therefore the Syrians concluded that the God of Israel was powerful on the mountains, but not in the plains; and they foolishly expected to prevail against Israel and JEHOVAH, by changing their ground. (Num. 23:13.) No doubt, however, they likewise considered the plain country as better suited to their army, which was furnished with cavalry and chariots of war, than to the foot soldiers of Israel. (*M. Verses 31—34.

This must have been a very great mortification to Ben-hadad: and that the kings of the house of Israel are [t] merciful kings: let us, I pray thee, [u] put sackcloth on our loins, and ropes upon our heads, and go out to the king of Israel; [u] peradventure he will save thy life.

32 So they girded sackcloth on their loins, and put ropes on their heads, and came to the king of Israel, and said, [v] Thy servant Ben-hadad saith, I pray thee, let me live. And he said, Is he yet alive? [x] he is my brother.

33 Now [y] the men did diligently observe whether any thing would come from him, and did hastily catch it: and they said, Thy brother Ben-hadad. Then he said, Go ye, bring him. Then Ben-hadad came forth to him; [z] and he caused him to come up into the chariot.

34 And Ben-hadad said unto him, [a] The cities, which my father took from thy father, I will restore; and thou shalt make streets for thee in Damascus, as my father made in Samaria. Then, said Ahab, I will send thee away with this covenant. [b] So he made a covenant with him, and sent him away.

35 ¶ And a certain man [c] of the sons of the prophets said unto his neighbor, [d] in the word of the LORD, [e] Smite me, I pray thee. And the man refused to smite him.

36 Then said he unto him, [f] Because thou hast not obeyed the voice of the LORD, behold, as soon as thou art departed from me, a lion shall slay thee. And as soon as he was departed from him, a lion found him, and slew him.

37 Then he found another man, and said, [g] Smite me, I pray thee. And the man smote him, [*] so that in smiting he wounded him.

38 So the prophet departed, and waited for the king by the way, and [h] disguised himself with ashes upon his face.

39 And as the king passed by, he cried unto the king: and he said, [i] Thy servant went out

'Cruelty has ever been throughout the E. the criterion of courage; and the power of a monarch or the valor of a nation has always been estimated by the inexorability of their character. the conqueror?' This word brother they catch at, (v. 33.) and were encouraged by that to go and fetch their king; he that calls him brother, will let him live. Let poor penitents hear God, in his Word, calling them children, (Jer. 31: 20.) and call him Father. Ben-hadad, on his submission, shall not only be honorably conveyed, (he took him up into the chariot,) but treated with as an ally; (v. 34.) he made a covenant with him, not consulting either God's prophets, or the elders of the land, or himself, concerning what was fit to be insisted on, but, as if Ben-hadad had been conqueror, he shall make his own terms: he is content with a poor liberty, at his own expense, to build streets in Damascus, a point of honor, and no advantage. With this covenant he sent him away, without so much as reproving him for his blasphemous reflections on the God of Israel, whose honor Ahab had no concern for. Note, There are those on whom success is ill bestowed; they know not how to serve either God or their generation, or even their own true interests, with their prosperity: Let favor be showed to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness.

III. The reproof to Ahab for his clemency, and covenant; given by a prophet, in the name of the Lord; the Jews say by Micaiah, and not unlikely, for Ahab complains of him, (ch. 22: 8.) that he used to prophesy evil concerning him: this prophet designed to reprove Ahab by a parable, (to oblige him to condemn himself, as Nathan and the woman of Tekoa did David;) to make it the more plausible, he feigns to be a wounded soldier.

1. With some difficulty, he gets himself wounded, for he would not do it with his own hands; one of his brother prophets, his neighbor or companion, (for so the word signifies,) v. 35. declined it, we cannot but think from a good principle. Good men can much more easily receive a wrongful blow than give one; yet because he disobeyed an express command of God, (which was so much the worse if he were himself a prophet,) like that other disobedient prophet, ch. 13: 24. he was presently slain by a lion, v. 36. This was intended, not only to show, in general, how provoking disobedience is, (Col. 3: 6.) but to intimate to Ahab, who, no doubt, was told the story, that if a good prophet were thus punished for sparing his friend and God's, when God said, Smite, of much sorer punishment should a wicked king be thought worthy, who spared his enemy and God's, when God said, Smite. Shall mortal man pretend to be more just than God, more pure or more compassionate than his Maker? We must be merciful as He is merciful, not otherwise. The next he met, made no difficulty of smiting him, v. 37.

it was equally flattering to Ahab's vanity; who, seduced by it, forgot both the interests of Israel, and his own real honor and security.—These streets of Damascus were probably allotted the Israelites for the purposes of trade, that in them they might live unmolested according to their own laws. The prophet appeared, either as one wounded in the face, and so covered with a bandage like a veil to disguise himself, as many understand it; or he assumed the character of a mourner, being under condemnation to die, seeing he could not pay the talent of silver required of him; or he united both. CHAP. XXI. Ahab is still the unhappy subject of the sacred history; from the great affairs of his camp and kingdom this ch. leads us into his garden, and gives us an account of some ill things, (ill indeed they proved to him,) relating to his domestic affairs.

V. 1—4. Here is, I. Ahab's coveting his neighbor's vineyard; perhaps, Naboth had been pleased his vineyard lay so advantageously for a prospect of the royal gardens, or the vending of its productions to the royal family, but it proved fatal to him; many a man's possessions have been his snare, and his neighborhood to greatness, of pernicious consequence. Ahab sets his eye on this vineyard, v. 2. and nothing will serve but it must be his; yet he is not such a tyrant as to take it by force, but fairly proposes, either to give him the full value of it in money, or a better vineyard in exchange; and to desire a convenience to his estate, was not evil; there would be no buying, if there was no desire of what is bought; the virtuous woman considers a field and buys it; but to desire any thing inordinately, though we would compass it by lawful means, is a fruit of selfishness, contrary to the law of contentment, and the letter of the tenth commandment.

II. The repulse he met with in this desire, v. 3. Canaan was, in a peculiar manner, God's land; the Israelites his tenants; and one of the conditions of their leases was, they should not alienate any part of what fell to their lot, unless in case of extreme necessity, and then only till the year of jubilee, Lev. 25: 28. Naboth foresaw, if his vineyard were sold to the crown, it would never return to his heirs, no not in the jubilee; he would gladly oblige the king, but he must obey God rather than men, therefore desires to be excused. Ahab knew the law, or should

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22—43. Fallen man has very confused, absurd, and dishonorable apprehensions of the divine attributes; and is thus emboldened to persist in his rebellion: and the most consummate wisdom, in worldly concerns, often unites with the most contemptible ignorance on religious subjects.—To silence the blasphemies, or to expose the mistakes of his enemies, the Lord sometimes gives temporary success to those, who, in another way, despise his warnings and disobey his precepts: but He will not countenance them in their crimes, nor let them finally escape condign punishment.—The whole creation is at war with those who fight against God; and He will surely render contemptible, as well as miserable, the haughtiest of them.—It indeed becomes all to be merciful; and clemency is the ornament of royalty, especially of the kings of Israel, the rulers of God's people: yet clemency to notorious criminals, whilst those who love and serve God are treated with cruelty, is strangely inconsistent.—In every thing the Lord demands implicit obedience; even the plea of compassion will not excuse rebellion against his will: and, by severe temporal judgments on such as have committed lighter offences, He loudly speaks terror to more atrocious criminals; whom He will at length constrain to decide against themselves. And whatever prosperity they may in the meantime obtain, it will be imbittered to them by what they feel, and what they fear; for 'there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked.'—Alas! how many that hear these glad tidings, are busy here and there, till the day of salvation is gone; and, not having wherewithal to ransom their souls, they must spend eternity in unavailing lamentations and despair. Even true believers are often so taken up with trifles, as to let seasons of important usefulness glide away unimproved, to the loss both of themselves and of others. SCOTT.

trusted to his keeping was one of superior rank; and that his officer, or captain, committed him to his care, with this injunction, or warning. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 2, 3. 'Our first parents had for their residence a beautiful garden, which may have had some influence on their immediate descendants, in giving them a predilection for such situations. People in England will scarcely be able to appreciate the value the orientals place on a garden. The food of many of them consists of vegetables, roots, and fruits; their medicines, also, being indigenous, are mostly produced in their gardens. Here they have their fine fruit trees, and the constant shade; and here they have their wells and places for bathing. See the proprietor, in his undress, walking around his little domain; his fence or wall is so high, no one can overlook him: he strolls about to smoke his shroot, pick up the fruit, and cull the flowers; he cares not for the world; his soul is satisfied with the scenes around him. Ahab wished to have Naboth's garden; but how could he part with "the inheritance of his fathers?" There was scarcely a tree which had not some pleasing associations connected with it: one was planted by the hand of a beloved ancestor, another in memory of some great event; (on the day a child is born, parents often plant a number of fruit trees;) the water he drank, and the fruit he ate, were from the same sources as those which refreshed his fathers. How then could he, in disobedience to God's command, and in violation of all these tender feelings, give up his garden to Ahab? To part with such a place is, to the people of the east, like parting with life itself.' ROBERTS.

have known it, therefore did ill to ask what his subject could not grant without sin. Some think Naboth took his earthly inheritance as an earnest of his lot in the heavenly, and therefore would not part with the former, lest he should forfeit the latter: he seems to have been a conscientious man, who would rather hazard the king's displeasure than offend God; probably, he was one of the 7000 that had not bowed the knee to Baal, for which, it may be, Ahab owed him a grudge.

III. Ahab's great discontent and uneasiness, hereupon, v. 4. He could by no means digest the affront; it was a thing not to be suffered; he cursed the squeamishness of Naboth's conscience, nor could he bear the disappointment, it cut him to the heart, he was perfectly sick for vexation. Note, 1. Discontent is a sin that is its own punishment, and makes men torment themselves; it makes the spirit sad, the body sick, and all the enjoyments sour; it is the heaviness of the heart, and the rottenness of the bones. 2. It is a sin that is its own parent; it arises not from the condition, but from the mind; Paul was contented in a prison, Ahab is discontented in a palace; he had all the delights of Canaan, that pleasant land, the wealth of a kingdom, the pleasures of a court, the honors and powers of a throne; yet all this avails him nothing without Naboth's vineyard. Inordinate desires expose men to continual vexations, and they that are disposed to fret, be they ever so happy, will always find something or other to fret at.

V. 5—16. Nothing but mischief is to be expected when Jezebel enters into the story—that cursed woman, 2 K. 9: 34.

I. Under pretence of comforting her afflicted husband, she feeds his pride and passion, and blows the coals of his corruptions. It became her to notice his grief, and inquire its cause, v. 5. Those have forgotten both the duty and affection of the conjugal relation, that interest not themselves in each other's troubles. He tells her what troubled him, (v. 6.) yet invidiously conceals Naboth's reason for his refusal, representing it as peevish, when it was conscientious; I will not give it thee, whereas he said, I may not. What! (says Jezebel, v. 7.) Dost thou govern Israel? Arise, and eat bread. She does well to persuade him to shake off his melancholy; grieving would not redress it, but pleasantness would alleviate it; her plea is capable of a good sense; 'Does it become so great a prince, to cast himself down for so small a matter? Art thou fit to govern Israel, who hast no better a government of thine own passions? Or hast thou so rich a kingdom at command, and canst not thou be without this one vineyard?' We should learn to quiet ourselves, under our crosses, with the thoughts of the mercies we enjoy, especially our hopes of the kingdom. But she meant it in a bad sense; 'Art thou a king? It is below thee to buy and pay, much more to beg and pray; stretch thy prerogative, and take the vineyard by force; instead of resenting the affront, revenge it: give me leave to use thy name, and I will soon give thee the vineyard, and it shall cost thee nothing.' Unhappy princes those are, and hurried apace toward their ruin, who have those about them, that stir them up to acts of tyranny, and teach them how to abuse their power.

II. To gratify him, she projects and compasses Naboth's death; no less than his blood will atone for the affront he had given Ahab, which she thirsts after the more greedily, because of his adherence to the law of the God of Israel. Had she aimed only at his land, her false witnesses might have sworn him out of that by a forged deed; but the adulteress will hunt for the precious life. Revenge is sweet.

1. Never were more wicked orders given by any prince, v. 8—10. She borrows the privy-seal, but the king shall not know what she will do with it: probably this was not the first time he had lent it her, but that with it she had signed warrants to slay the prophets. She uses the king's name, knowing the thing would please him when done, yet fearing he might scruple the manner of doing it; in short, she commands them, on their allegiance, to put Naboth to death, without giving them any reason. To oblige them to find the witnesses, to suborn them themselves, and then to give judgment on a testimony they knew to be false, was such an impudent defiance to every thing just and sacred, as we hope cannot be paralleled in any story; she must look upon the elders of Jezreel as men perfectly lost to every thing honest and honorable, when she expected these orders to be obeyed; but she will put them in a way how to do it, having as much of the serpent's subtilty as of his poison.

(1.) It must be done under color of religion.—'Proclaim a fast, as if apprehensive of some dreadful judgment, which you would avert, not only by prayer, but by finding out and putting away the accursed thing; charge the people, if they know of any great offender, to inform against him, and at last let Naboth be fastened on as the suspected person, that may serve for a pretence to set him on high, i. e. to call him to the bar. Note, No wickedness is so vile, so horrid, but religion has sometimes been made a cloak for it. We must not at all think the worse of fasting and praying for their having been sometimes thus abused, but much the worse of those wicked designs that have at any time been carried on under color of them.

(2.) It must be done under color of justice too, and with the formalities of a legal process. Had she sent to them to hire some desperate ruffians to assassinate him, it had been bad enough; but to do it by a course of law, to use that power to murder the innocent, which ought to be their protection, was such a violent perverting of justice and judgment as yet we are bid not to marvel at, Eccl. 5: 8. The crime they must lay to his charge, was a complicated blasphemy. His blaspheming God would be the forfeiture of his life, but not of his estate, therefore he is also charged with treason, in blaspheming the king, for which his estate was to be confiscated, that so Ahab might have his vineyard.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. It is natural to us, as fallen creatures, to hanker after those things which are withheld from us; and every accession of wealth or prosperity, increases the violence of this propensity. The commandment indeed, which forbids us to covet, 'is holy, just, and good,' the fence of our neighbor's property, and of our own peace and integrity. (Ex. 20: 17.) But alas! 'it is weak through the flesh;' and the impetuous torrent of our lusts easily bursts the salutary barrier, and rages the more for having been opposed. (Rom. 8: 3, 4.)—Pride cannot brook opposition: every plea of conscience is treated as mere pretence; and the best intended actions, of the most blameless and excellent persons, are ascribed to the worst of motives. But such passions are serpents cherished in a man's bosom, the bite of which inflicts exquisite torture and death.—Providential blessings well answer the end for which they were intended, but cannot form a rational creature's felicity. Our more intimate connections are of the highest importance; when, instead of a prudent and pious counsellor, a man has a factor for Satan in the form of an artful, unprincipled, and beloved woman, what fatal effects may not be expected! 'Be ye not therefore unequally yoked with unbelievers.'—It is hard to relate facts, respecting ourselves, with simplicity and impartiality; but much more difficult to restrain those within the strict limits of equity, who are able to seize on the objects of their desires, without fear of being called to account before any human tribunal.—A little acquaintance with history, and with human nature, will terminate our astonishment at such transactions; for 'nothing is new under the sun:' but they must ever excite our regret, our compassion, and our indignation. SCOTT.

were in his city, dwelling with Naboth.

9 And she wrote in the letters, saying, [t] Proclaim a fast, and set Naboth * on high among the people;

10 And set [u] two men, [x] sons of Belial, before him, to bear witness against him, saying, [y] Thou didst blaspheme God and the king. And then carry him out, and stone him, that he may die.

11 And the men of his city, even the elders and the nobles, who were the inhabitants in his city, [z] did as Jezebel had sent unto them, and as it was written in the letters which she had sent unto them.

12 They [a] proclaimed a fast, and set Naboth on high among the people.

13 And there came in two men, children of Belial, and sat before him: and [b] the men of Belial witnessed against him, even against Naboth, in the presence of the people, saying, Naboth did [c] blaspheme God and [d] the king. Then [e] they carried him forth out of the city, and stoned him with stones, that he died.

14 Then they sent to Jezebel, saying, [f] Naboth is stoned, and is dead.

15 And it came to pass, when Jezebel heard that Naboth was stoned, and was dead, that Jezebel said to Ahab, [g] Arise, take possession of the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, which he refused to give thee for money: for Naboth is not alive, but dead.

16 And it came to pass, when Ahab heard that Naboth was dead, that [h] Ahab rose up to go down to the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, to take possession of it.

[Practical Observations.]

17 ¶ And [i] the word of the LORD came to Elijah the Tishbite, saying,

18 Arise, go down to meet Ahab king of Israel, [k] which is in Samaria: behold, he is in the vineyard of Naboth, whither he is gone down to possess it.

19 And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, [l] Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, [m] In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine.

20 And Ahab said to Elijah, [n] Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? And he answered, I have found thee: because [o] thou hast sold thyself [p] to work evil in the sight of the LORD,

2. Never were wicked orders more wickedly obeyed. They do not so much as dispute the command, or make any objections against it, though so palpably unjust; but punctually observe all the particulars of it, either because they fear Jezebel's cruelty, or hate Naboth's piety, or both, v. 11, 12. They stoned Naboth, (v. 13.) and, as it should seem, his sons with him, or after him: for when God made inquisition for blood, we find that article in the account, 2 K. 9: 26. Perhaps they were secretly murdered, that they might not claim their father's estate, or complain of the wrong done him. Here we may well stand amazed at the wickedness of the wicked, and the power of Satan in them; lament the hard case of oppressed innocency; commit the keeping of our lives and comforts to God; and rejoice in the belief of a judgment to come, in which such wrong judgments as these will be called over. We see there be just men to whom it happens according to the work of the wicked, but all will be set right in the great day.

III. Naboth being taken off, Ahab takes possession of his vineyard. 1. The elders sent notice to Jezebel very unconcernedly, as a piece of agreeable news, Naboth is stoned, and is dead, v. 14. Observe their obsequiousness, as that of the elders of Samaria afterwards to Jehu's orders, which he sent from Jezreel for the murder of Ahab's 70 sons; only that was not done by course of law, 2 K. 10: 6, 7. Tyrants, that debauch the consciences of inferior magistrates, may, perhaps, find at last the wheel return on them; and that those who will not stick to do one cruel thing for them, will be as ready to do another cruel thing against them. 2. Jezebel, jocund enough that her plot succeeded so well, notifies Ahab, that Naboth is dead, therefore, Arise, take possession of his vineyard, v. 15. And so pleased is he that he will make a journey to Jezreel himself to enter on it; it should seem in state, too, as if he had got some mighty victory, for Jehu remembers long after, that he and Bidkar attended him at this time, 2 K. 9: 25. Might often prevails against right, and wonderful is the divine patience that suffers it. God is certainly of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, yet for a time keeps silence, when the wicked devours one more righteous than he, Hab. 1: 13.

V. 17—29. In these vs. observe,

I. The very bad character given of Ahab, (v. 25, 26.) which comes in here, to justify God in the heavy sentence passed on him, and to show that though passed on occasion of his sin, in the matter of Naboth, yet God would not have punished him so severely, had he not been guilty of many other sins, especially idolatry. Blessed Paul complains that he was sold under sin, as a poor captive against his will; but Ahab was voluntary, he sold himself to sin. Yet this did not excuse him. Jezebel his wife made him, in many respects, worse than otherwise he would have been.

II. Elijah's message to him, v. 17—19. Hitherto God kept silence, but now Ahab is reproved, and his sin set in order before his eyes. 1. A prophet of lower rank was sent with messages of kindness to him, ch. 20: 13. But the father of

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8—16. There will always be found those in every rank, who will prostitute their talents, influence, and conscience, to the tyrant who rewards iniquity. Let us then bless God for a limited government, and for security from such outrages of oppression.—And let judges, juries, and witnesses beware of being warped, in their decisions, verdicts, or testimony, by fear, affection, or interest: for those, who now are placed on the tribunal, must shortly stand at the bar, to answer before a heart-searching, impartial Judge, for their conduct in their important stations. Verses 17—19.

Some learned men think that the word rendered 'the place where,' may mean, in like manner as: but this signification of the original word is unprecedented. Others suppose, that the word place is taken in a large sense, for all the adjacent region; and so includes Samaria, where Ahab dwelt, and where he was buried; as well as the city of Jezreel. (22:37, 38.) But may we not say, that, as dogs licked the blood of Ahab, literally, when his chariot was washed in the pool of Samaria; so they licked his blood, as flowing through and from the veins of his son Joram, when Joram was slain by Jehu, and his body thrown into this very spot? (2 K. 9:25, 26.) SCOTT.

Verse 20.

After the slaughter of Baal's prophets, and Elijah's flight from Jezebel, Ahab had returned to his wicked course of life, and shunned the prophet as his worst enemy: and it does not appear, that Elijah had seen him since those events. (22:8, 9.)—Elijah did not deny that he was an enemy to his wickedness: he neither paid respect to him, nor was intimidated by his anger or power. He had found him, as a thief caught in the fact; and, in the name of God, he denounced the most tremendous sentence of condemnation on him and on his posterity. (Jer. 2:26—30.) For Ahab had 'sold himself,' as a willing slave to his lusts. This is very different from 'being sold under sin;' so that, through the remaining power of corrupt nature, a man who 'delights in the law of God,' and hates all sin, yet 'cannot do the things that he would.' In the former case, the slavery is voluntary, the will itself is enslaved: in the latter, it is involuntary, and is a man's grief and distress. 'To will is present with me: but how to perform that which is good, I find not.'—'Oh wretched man that I am!' (Rom. 7:13—25.) ID.

21 Behold, [z] I will bring evil upon thee, and will take away thy posterity, and will cut off from Ahab [a] him that pisseth against the wall, and [b] him that is shut up and left in Israel,

23 And of [e] Jezebel also spake the LORD, saying, The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the * wall of Jezreel.

24 Him [f] that dieth of Ahab in the city the dogs shall eat; and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat.

26 And he did [k] very abominably in following idols, [l] according to all things as did the Amorites, whom the LORD cast out before the children of Israel.

27 And it came to pass, when Ahab heard those words, that [m] he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasted, and [n] lay in sackcloth, and [o] went softly.

28 And the word of the LORD came to Elijah the Tishbite, saying,

29 [p] Seest thou how [q] Ahab humbleth himself before me? because he humbleth himself before me, [r] I will not bring [s] the evil in his days: but [t] in his son's days will I bring the evil upon his house.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17—29. Such ministers of God, as are most decidedly faithful, must expect to be deemed morose, and even malevolent, by sinners, whose consciences have been galled with their plain warnings and rebukes, but whose hearts are wedded to their lusts. On the other hand, impenitent sinners often account those to be their friends, who speak smooth things, and help them to deceive themselves: and are very lavish in their commendation, by way of contrasting them with those whom they deem their enemies; that it may be thought they love religion, while they hate its firmest friends.—But 'the man of God' will neither desire the applause, nor fear the reproach, of those who have 'sold themselves to work wickedness,' and evince that they are the enemies of God and holiness. At the tribunal of God, the difference will be manifest to all men, between the most lamentable falls of true believers, and the habitual wickedness of ungodly men; and between true repentance, and all external, partial, and temporary appearances of it.—Before the searching Word of God, the most hardened conscience (with very few exceptions) will sometimes be disquieted, and the stoutest hearts tremble; and for a season sinners will speak and act as if truly penitent.—Whilst we are warned to beware of counterfeits, we are encouraged by the abounding grace of God, which He will never withhold from the upright, humble soul; seeing He so delights in mercy, that He extends it even to wicked men, as far as consists with his justice, holiness, truth, and wisdom. We may also be animated to abound in the work of the Lord, assured that our labor will not be in vain; since He even recompenses in kind the formal services of his enemies. SCOTT.

Verse 23.

This circumstance not only predicted the dreadful manner in which Jezebel should be slain, but denoted the worst punishment of sin to be after death. Verses 25, 26.

Ahab's crime, in respect of Naboth, was not a detached part of his conduct, contrary to the general course of his life, as David's sin in the matter of Uriah had been; but a specimen of his continued rebellion against God. (Rom. 7:15—17.) (M. R. k, l.) SCOTT.

Verses 27—29.

He did not, that we find, so much as restore Naboth's vineyard to his heirs; much less did he put away Jezebel, or renounce idolatry, and establish the worship of God. However, he would have acted still worse, if he had vindicated and gloried in his crimes, or attempted to put the prophet to death: therefore the Lord recompensed his outward temporary repentance with a similar reward. 'Accordingly it was his son's blood, not his, which was licked up by the dogs, in the portion of Jezreel.' Patrick. (17—19.)—Jezebel was too hardened to show any symptoms of remorse on this, or any other occasion. (Acts 24:24—27.) SCOTT.

Has a proud, boasting man been humbled, the people say, "Aha! aha! he can now walk Mitha-vāka, i. e. softly." "What, the proud Muttoo walk softly; who ever expected that?"' NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. Three years.] During this time Ben-hadad was, no doubt, recruiting his forces, and preparing for war; having by no means adhered to the treaty, which Ahab had made with him. SCOTT.

2 And it came to pass [b] in the third year, that [c] Jehoshaphat the king of Judah came down to the king of Israel.

3 And the king of Israel said unto his servants, Know ye, that [d] Ramoth in Gilead is ours, and we be * still, and take it not out of the hand of the king of Syria?

4 And he said unto Jehoshaphat, Wilt thou go with me to battle to Ramoth-gilead? And Jehoshaphat said to the king of Israel, [e] I am as thou art, my people as thy people, my horses as thy horses.

5 And Jehoshaphat said unto the king of Israel, [f] Inquire, I pray thee, at the word of the LORD to-day.

6 Then the king of Israel gathered [h] the prophets together, about four hundred men, and said unto them, Shall I go against Ramoth-gilead to battle, or shall I forbear? And they said, [i] Go up; for the LORD shall deliver it into the hand of the king.

7 And Jehoshaphat said, [j] Is there not here a prophet of the LORD besides, that we might inquire of him?

of pardon; and because he did hereby give some glory to God, God took notice of it, and bade Elijah take notice of it, v. 29. In consideration of this, though the sentence should not be revoked, the execution should be suspended. Now, (1.) This discovers the great goodness of God, and his readiness to show mercy. Favor is showed to this wicked man, that God might magnify his goodness, (says Bp. Sanderson,) even to the hazard of his other divine perfections; as if, (says he,) God would be thought unholy, or untrue, or unjust, (though He be none of these,) or any thing, rather than unmerciful. (2.) This teaches us to notice that which is good, even in those who are not so good as they should be: let it be commended as far as it goes. (3.) This gives a reason why wicked people sometimes prosper long: God is rewarding their external services with external mercies. (4.) This encourages all those that truly repent, and unfeignedly believe the holy Gospel. If a pretending, partial penitent shall go to his house, reprieved, doubtless, a sincere penitent shall go to his house, justified.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1—14. This ch. finishes the history of Ahab's reign, in that of his war with the Syrians at Ramoth-gilead. Though Ahab continued under guilt and wrath, and the dominion of the lusts to which he had sold himself, yet, as a reward for his professions of repentance and humiliation, though the time drew near when he should descend into battle and perish, we still have him blessed with a three years' peace, (v. 1.) and an honorable visit from Jehoshaphat king of Judah, v. 2. It is strange, so great a man as Jehoshaphat would pay so much respect to a kingdom revolted from the house of David; and so good a man show so much kindness to a king revolted from the worship of God. But, though a godly man, his temper was too easy, which betrayed him into snares and inconveniences.

The Syrians durst not give Ahab any disturbance. But, I. Ahab here meditates a war against the Syrians, and advises concerning it with those about him, v. 3. Now, he knows by experience, what he ought to have considered, that as the kisses, so the promises, of an enemy are deceitful; and no confidence is to be put in leagues extorted by distress. Ben-hadad is one of those princes that think themselves bound by their word no further, and no longer, than it is for their interest. Whether any other cities were restored, according to promise, ch. 20, 34. we do not find, but Ramoth-gilead was not: a considerable city in Gad, on the other side Jordan, a Levites' city, and one of the cities of refuge. Ahab blames himself, and people, that they did not bestir themselves to recover it, and to chastise Ben-hadad's violation of his league; and resolves to do it now. Ahab has a good cause, yet succeeds not. Equity is not to be judged of by prosperity.

II. He draws in Jehoshaphat, to join him in this expedition, v. 4. I do not wonder he should desire the assistance of one so pious and prosperous; even bad men often covet the friendship of the good. But it is strange Jehoshaphat will go so entirely into Ahab's interests, v. 4. Too great complaisance to evil-doers, has brought many good people, through unwariness, into dangerous fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. Yet some observe, that, in joining Israel against Syria, he atoned for his father's fault, in joining Syria against Israel, ch. 15: 19, 20.

III. Ahab thought it enough to consult with his statesmen, but Jehoshaphat moves they should inquire of the word of the Lord, v. 5. Note, 1. Whithersoever a good man goes, he desires to take God along with him, will acknowledge Him and look up to Him for counsel and success. He ought not to be ashamed to own his religion, no not when with those who have no kindness for it. 2. If Ahab drew him into his wars, he will draw Ahab into his devotions.

IV. Ahab's 400 prophets, (a standing regiment prophets of the groves they called them,) agreed to encourage this expedition, and assure him of success, v. 6. He put the question with seeming fairness. But they knew his inclination, and designed only to humor the two kings. To please Jehoshaphat, they made use of the name Jehovah; stealing the word from the two prophets, (Jer. 23: 30.) and using their language. To please Ahab, they said, Go up. They had, indeed, probabilities on their side; Ahab had, not long since, beaten the Syrians twice; he had now a good cause, and was much strengthened by his alliance with Jehoshaphat; but they pretended to speak by prophecy, not by rational conjecture; 'Thou shalt certainly recover Ramoth-gilead.' Zedekiah, a leading man among them, in imitation of the true prophets, illustrated his false prophecy with a sign, v. 11. He made a pair of iron horns, representing the two kings, and their honor and power, both which were signified by horns, exaltation and force. All agreed, as one man, that Ahab should return a conqueror, v. 12. Unity is not always the mark of a true church, and true ministry.

V. Jehoshaphat cannot relish this sort of preaching; he was not used to it; the false prophets cannot so mimic the true, but that he who had spiritual senses exercised, could discern the fallacy, therefore he inquires for a prophet of the Lord besides, v. 7. He is too much a courtier to reflect on the king's chaplains, but he waits to see a prophet of the Lord; intimating that he could not look upon these to be so.

VI. Ahab has another, one he hates, but, to please Jehoshaphat, he will have him sent for, v. 8—10. Ahab owned he was a true prophet, one that knew God's mind. Yet, 1. He hated him, and was not ashamed to own it, and to give his reason for it. Note, Those are wretchedly hardened in sin, and ripening apace for ruin, who hate God's ministers, because they deal plainly with them, and faithfully warn them of their misery and danger by reason of sin. 2. He had (it should seem) imprisoned him; for when he committed him, (v. 26.) he bade the officer carry him back; namely, to the place whence he came. We may suppose this was he that reproved him, (ch. 20: 38, &c.) and for that was cast into prison,

Verse 2.

We shall have a better opportunity hereafter, of fully considering Jehoshaphat's character. (2 Chr. 17:—20.)—He was very criminal in marrying his son to one of the family of idolatrous Ahab, which probably occasioned his visit at Samaria, with all its consequences. (2 K. 8: 18. 2 Chr. 18: 1.)

SCOTT.

Verse 4.

Jehoshaphat meant nothing more, than to express his readiness to afford Ahab every assistance in his power; as both he and his forces were at his command: but the language seemed to countenance all Ahab's undertakings; or at least to treat all the differences in opinion and conduct between him and Ahab as unimportant! Yet surely there was an essential difference between the reformer of Judah, and the corrupter of Israel! But excessive pliability of temper was the grand defect in Jehoshaphat's character. (2 K. 8: 18. 9: 27, 28. 10: 13, 14. 11: 1, 2. 2 Chr. 18: 1. 19: 2.)

Verse 6.

It is most probable, these were the prophets of the groves, who escaped, when the prophets of Baal were slain at the command of Elijah; for certainly they were false prophets. (18:18—20, 40.) No doubt, they commonly prophesied in the name of Baal, or of some idol: but it seems that occasionally they could speak in the name of the LORD. In this verse indeed the word is not JEHOVAH, but Adonai, which is used with greater latitude: but afterwards both Zedekiah, and the rest of them, used the word JEHOVAH. (11, 12.) Like some modern philosophers and poets, they perhaps would argue, that it was all one, whether the Supreme Being were called Baal, or JEHOVAH, or Jupiter. They perhaps allowed Jehoshaphat to be a good sort of man: but he had some narrow prejudices, and would not be satisfied, if they said, 'Go up, for Baal shall deliver it into the hand of the King;' and they would scorn to disagree with him about a trifling variation, which they could make with little trouble, and without expense.

SCOTT

Jehoshaphat must have regarded these prophets as deceivers and sycophants, whose interest it was to counsel Ahab to please himself. He knew Israel was favored with Elijah, Elisha, and other eminent prophets, though none of them appeared at court: he felt dissatisfied; but being too afraid of giving offence, he seemed to allow that these were prophets of God, yet he wished to consult some other, if there were any to be found. Perhaps he took occasion, from their using the word Adonai, (which might mean either the God of Israel, or a false god,) to inquire after some other prophet of JEHOVAH: and this might induce them afterwards to change their language in this respect. His subsequent conduct, however, shows that he paid far more regard to them, than he ought to have done, or than they deserved. Indeed,

8 And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, There is [k] yet one man, Micaiah the son of Imlah, by whom we may inquire of the LORD; [l] but I hate him, for he doth not prophesy [m] good [n] concerning me, but evil. And Jehoshaphat said, [o] Let not the king say so.

9 Then the king of Israel called an * officer, and said, [p] Hasten hither Micaiah the son of Imlah.

[Practical Observations.]

10 And the king of Israel and Jehoshaphat the king of Judah sat each on his throne, [q] having put on their robes, in a † void place in the entrance of the gate of Samaria; and [r] all the prophets prophesied before them.

11 And Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah made him [s] horns of iron: and he said, [t] Thus saith the LORD, With these shalt thou push the Syrians, until thou have consumed them.

12 And all the prophets prophesied so, saying, [u] Go up to Ramoth-gilead, and prosper; for the LORD shall deliver it into the king's hand.

13 And the messenger that was gone to call Micaiah, spake unto him, saying, [x] Behold now, the words of the prophets declare good unto the king with one mouth: let thy word, I pray thee, be like the word of one of them, and speak that which is good.

14 And Micaiah said, As the LORD liveth, [y] what the LORD saith unto me, that will I speak.

15 ¶ So he came to the king. And the king said unto him, Micaiah, where he had lain these three years. Hence Ahab knew where to find him so readily, v. 9. But his imprisonment had not excluded divine visits; nor did it in the least abate his courage, or make him less confident or faithful. Jehoshaphat gave Ahab too gentle a reproof, for expressing his indignation against a faithful prophet, Let not the king say so, v. 8. Such sinners as Ahab, must be rebuked sharply. However, he so far yielded to the reproof, that, for fear of provoking Jehoshaphat to break off his alliance, he sends for Micaiah with all speed, v. 9. to hear what he had to say; many will give God's Word the hearing, that will not obey it.

Lastly, Micaiah is pressed by the officer that fetched him, to follow the cry, v. 13. He thought him altogether such a one as the rest, who studied to please men, and not God. They that dote on worldly things themselves, think every body else should do so too, and, true or false, right or wrong, speak and act for their secular interest only. He intimates likewise, that it would be to no purpose to contradict such a numerous and unanimous vote. But Micaiah knows better things, protests it, and backs his protestation with an oath, that he will deliver his message from God with all faithfulness, whether it be pleasing or displeasing to his prince, v. 14. Bravely resolved!—and as became one who had his eye to the greater King.

V. 15—28. Micaiah, as is common, suffers ill for doing well.

I. Three ways he delivers the message, and all displeasing to Ahab.

1. He speaks as the rest of the prophets, but ironically, Go, and prosper, v. 15. as if he had said, 'I know you are determined to go, and I hear your own prophets are unanimous in assuring you of success; go then, and take what follows.' Note, Those deserve to be bantered, that love to be flattered; and it is just with God to give up those to their own counsels, that give up themselves to their own lusts, Eccl. 11: 9. In answer to this, Ahab adjures him to tell him the truth, (v. 16.) as if he sincerely desired to know both what God would have him do, and what He would do with him; yet intending to represent the prophet as a perverse, ill-humored man, that would not tell him the truth, till adjured to do it.

2. Thus pressed, he plainly foretold that the king would be cut off, and his army scattered, v. 17. He saw them in a dream, dispersed on the mountains, as sheep that have no one to guide them: i. e. Israel should be deprived of their king, who was their shepherd; God took notice of it, These have no master. He does not foresee any great slaughter, but they should make a dishonorable retreat; their king shall fall, but they shall go home in peace. Now Ahab finds himself aggrieved, turns to Jehoshaphat, and appeals to him, whether Mi-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. They, who neglect the word of God to rely on the promises of ungodly men, generally meet with merited disappointment: but this does not excuse the treachery and ingratitude of those, who deceive and injure the very persons, that have been criminally kind to them.—That same compliant spirit, which betrays some pious persons into amity with the declared enemies of religion, renders the connection peculiarly dangerous to them: they are perpetually persuaded to improper concessions of every kind; and induced to connive at, and even sanction, such converse and conduct, as they ought decidedly to protest against: and the fear of being deemed uncourteous, and the desire of escaping censure, ridicule, or insult, for their religious peculiarities, stop their mouths, and cause them to deviate from sincerity in their expressions of civility or courteousness. Yet these alone are the godly persons whose acquaintance the men of the world will much desire. If, however, we are necessarily placed among profane or infidel characters, we must not yield either to fear or shame, so as to conceal our dependence on God and devotedness to Him; for these mark the difference 'between those who serve Him, and those who serve Him not.'—If it were to be decided by vote, what is the true religion, we see plainly, that those abominations which God abhors would gain the election, against that worship which He has instituted.—Those, who from ambition, avarice, or sensuality, 'turn away their ears from the truth,' and 'cannot endure sound doctrine,' will 'heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts: (2 Tim. 4: 1—5, vv. 3, 4.) that the agreement of so many ministers may embolden them to disregard those singular and uncourteous persons, who are always robbing them of their comfort, and putting them on an unnecessary strictness. A few individuals indeed hint, that something is wanting in their favorite instructers; nay, prefer such as they dislike. But then, are not these too scrupulous? Do they not carry matters too far? Do they make proper allowances for human frailty, and peculiar situations? Thus eventually smooth doctrine, united with confidence, ingenuity, and courtly manners, obtains the preference, and opens the way to the favor of the great and of the many. The faithful servants of God must therefore lay their account with hatred, contempt, and insult. They know not to give flattering words, or to call base crimes by soft names, or to buoy up the hopes of hypocrites with insinuating falsehoods: they cannot be silent, when called to speak; but must declare the counsel of God, and not keep back any thing profitable, however displeasing. Their conscientiousness will often be ascribed to pride and obstinacy; the language of their tender compassion for souls will be called severity or malevolence; and their plain-dealing will be branded as insolence and ill-manners. But they must commit their cause to God: and wicked men, who hate them for the truth's sake, will at length find, that they were their own enemies in so doing, and that in opposing them they strove against the Almighty.

he ought to have decidedly entered his protest against them, and warned Ahab of his danger, if he hearkened to them; as Micaiah did. At least he should have done this, after he had heard Micaiah's message. (17—28.) SCOTT.

Verse 8.

Micaiah is never mentioned in the history, except in this ch. and the history in 2 Chr. 18: yet he doubtless had several times been sent with messages of rebuke and warning to this haughty idolater: (9.) Ahab, therefore, while he allowed, that they might inquire of the LORD by him, acknowledged that he hated him! (Is. 30:8—11. John 7:3—10. 15:17—21.) But Jehoshaphat ventured gently to intimate that he ought not to speak thus: he ought neither to hate him, nor be displeased with his word, nor seek agreeable, but useful things; and he hoped on this occasion he would bring an encouraging message. In.

Verses 13, 14.

Perhaps this man intended to be friendly to Micaiah: and thought it a pity, that he should hinder his preferment, and expose himself to Ahab's resentment, by a needless or useless scrupulousness. Perhaps he concluded, that the unanimity and confidence, with which so great a number of prophets assured Ahab of success in the name of the LORD, proved them to be in the right; and that it would be foolish in Micaiah to oppose his single voice to such a multitude. And indeed, not only Ahab, but Jehoshaphat himself, seems to have been imposed on by the same delusive argument; which, in one form or other, has been urged as cogent, if not unanswerable, by very able and sensible men, in every age of the church. 'Thus it is in the church at this day.' Patrick. —Micaiah affords a most noble example in his reply. SCOTT.

Verse 16.

Ahab spake as if he had, on former occasions, thus adjured Micaiah to speak nothing to him, but 'that which was true in the name of the Lord;' and with some intimation, that the prophet needed such adjurations. He evidently aimed to be thought, especially by Jehoshaphat, exceedingly solicitous about discovering the will of God. Perhaps Micaiah hesitated, till repeatedly urged to speak: and some think, he did not receive his message, till the very moment before he delivered it.—The adjuring a person to speak, was equivalent to putting him on his oath; and calling on him, as in the presence and by the authority of God, to speak all he knew. (M. R.) SCOTT.

Verses 19—23.

In order to leave this hardened criminal without excuse, and to give a salutary instruction and warning to others in future ages, Micaiah received and related this vision.—It is not requisite to inquire particularly, concerning what passes in that world, where the Lord unveils his glory; for truths, rather than facts, are revealed in such representations. (Job 1:6.)—God had doomed Ahab to fall at Ramoth-gilead, by the army of Ben-hadad, whom he had sinfully spared. (20:31—34, 41, 42.) To bring him thither, He was pleased to give an evil spirit leave to impose on him, with the hopes of success. 'The devil and his angels' are always ready for such attempts, and generally use false prophets and teachers as their ministers. (2 Cor. 11:13—15.) This method the lying spirit proposed on the present occasion, and prevailed against Ahab, by inducing all his prophets to assure him of victory. And by permitting him to do this, 'the LORD put a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets.' (22) He neither commanded nor inclined the lying spirit to tempt Ahab's prophets; nor did He put the wickedness into their hearts, or the lies into their mouths. He likewise gave Ahab fair warning; and had he not hated the truth, and loved a lie, he would not have gone to Ramoth-gilead: but God foresaw he would go, and would perish there.—The prophet 'saw the LORD sitting on his throne,' and that made him disregard Ahab on his throne, and not fear his frown and vengeance; nor the resentment of the 400 prophets, who must have been enraged, even to madness, at being thus publicly declared to be the ministers of the devil, to deceive and persuade their king to his destruction. (M. R.—Ez. 14:1—11. 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) SCOTT.

sion, that the devil deceives men. Thereby God serves his own purposes. The deceived and the deceiver are his, Job 12: 16. When He pleases, for the punishment of those who receive not the truth in the love of it, He not only lets Satan loose to deceive them, (Rev. 20: 7, 8.) but gives up men to strong delusions to believe him, 2 Thess. 2: 11, 12. (7.) Those are manifestly marked for ruin, that are thus given up; God has certainly spoken evil concerning those whom He has given up to be imposed on by lying prophets; thus Micaiah gave Ahab fair warning, not only of the danger of proceeding in this war, but of the danger of believing those that encouraged him to proceed; thus we are warned to beware of false prophets, and to try the spirits; the lying spirit never deceives so fatally, as in the mouth of prophets.

II. We are here told, how he was abused for delivering his message thus faithfully, thus plainly, in a way so very proper both to convince and to affect.

1. Zedekiah, a wicked prophet, impudently insulted him in the face of the court; as if he not only had the Spirit of the Lord, but the monopoly of this Spirit, that he might not go without his leave, he asks, Which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me to speak to thee? v. 24. The false prophets were always the worst enemies the true prophets had, and not only stirred up the government against them, but were themselves abusive to them. Ahab was pleased, and Jehoshaphat had not courage to appear for the injured prophet; but Micaiah, though he returns not his blow, (God's prophets dare not avenge themselves, or be, any way, accessary to the breach of the peace,) yet, since he boasted so much of the Spirit, as those commonly do, that know least of his operations; he leaves him to be convinced of his error by the event; v. 25. It is likely, Zedekiah went with Ahab to the battle, to return in triumph with the king; but the army being routed, he fled among the rest and sheltered himself as Ben-hadad had done, in a chamber within a chamber, (ch. 20: 30.) lest he should perish. Note, Those that will not have their mistakes rectified in time by the Word of God, will be undeceived, when it is too late, by the judgments of God.

2. Ahab, that wicked king, committed him to prison; (v. 27.) to be fed with bread and water, coarse bread and puddle-water, till he should return; not doubting he should return a conqueror, and then he would put him to death for a false prophet, v. 27. Hard usage for one that would have prevented his ruin! But by this it appeared God had determined to destroy him, as 2 Chr. 25: 16. How confident is Ahab of success! He doubts not but he shall return in peace, forgetting what he himself had reminded Ben-hadad of, Let not him that girdeth on the harness, boast. Micaiah puts it on the issue, and calls all the people to be witnesses that he did so, v. 28. 'Let me incur the reproach and punishment of a false prophet, if the king come home alive.' He knew whom he had believed; He that is terrible to the kings of the earth, and treads on princes as mortar, will rather let thousands of them fall to the ground, than one jot or tittle of his own word; He will not fail to confirm the word of his servants.

V. 29—40. The matter in contest between God's prophet and Ahab's prophet, is here soon determined.

I. The two kings march to Ramoth-gilead, v. 29. That Ahab should persist is not strange; but that Jehoshaphat, that pious prince, who had desired to inquire by a prophet of the Lord, as disrelishing and discrediting Ahab's prophets, should yet proceed, after so fair a warning, is matter of astonishment; but by the easiness of his temper he was carried away with the delusion; Micaiah had not forbidden them to go; nay, at first, he said, Go, and prosper; if it came to the worst, it was only Ahab's fall that was foretold, and therefore he hoped he might venture.

II. Ahab contrives to secure himself, and expose his friend, v. 30. He pretended hereby to honor Jehoshaphat, and compliment him with the sole command of the army. Ahab will serve as a soldier under him; but he intended, 1. To make a liar of a good prophet; thus he hoped to elude the danger, and so to defeat the threatening, as if, by disguising himself, he could escape the divine cognizance, and the judgments that pursued him. 2. To make a fool of a good king, whom he did not cordially love, because he was one that adhered to God, and so condemned his apostasy. Ahab was marked for ruin: one would not have been in his attire for a great sum; yet he will over-persuade this godly king to muster for him. See what they get, that join affinity with vicious men, whose consciences are debauched, and who are lost to every thing honorable. How can it be expected he should be true to his friend, that has been false to his God?

III. Jehoshaphat, having more piety than policy, put himself into the post of honor, though the post of danger, but was thereby brought into peril of his life; the king of Syria charged his captains to level their force, not against the king of Judah, for with him he had no quarrel, but with the king of Israel only, v. 31. Now Ahab was justly repaid for sparing Ben-hadad, who, as the seed of the serpent commonly do, stung the bosom in which he was fostered, and saved from perishing; though some think he designed only to have him taken prisoner, that he might now give him as honorable a treatment as he had formerly received from him. Now, God let Jehoshaphat know He was displeased with him for joining in confederacy with Ahab; they that associate with evil doers, are in danger of sharing in their plagues. By his deliverance, God let him know that though displeased with him, yet He had not deserted him; some of the captains knew him, it is said, (2 Chr. 18: 31.) God moved them (for He has all hearts in his hand) to depart from him; to Him he cried out, not in cowardice, but devotion, and from Him his relief came; Ahab was in no care to succor him; God is a Friend that will not fail us, when other friends do.

IV. Ahab received his mortal wound, notwithstanding his endeavors to secure himself. Let no man think to hide himself from God's judgments, no, not in masquerade; Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies, v. 34. The Syrian, that shot him, little thought of doing such a service, not aiming particularly at any man; yet God so directed the arrow, that he hit the right person, and hit him in the right place. No armor is proof against the darts of divine vengeance: case the criminal in steel, and it is all one; He that made him, can make his sword to approach to him. That which to us seems altogether casual, is done by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God.

V. The army was dispersed by the enemy, and sent home by the king. Either Jehoshaphat or Ahab ordered the retreat, v. 36. We may well imagine with what horror Ahab now reflected on the wickedness he had committed, the warnings he had slighted, Baal's altars, Naboth's vineyard, Micaiah's imprisonment; now he sees himself flattered into his own ruin, and Zedekiah's horns of iron pushing, not the Syrians, but himself, into destruction. Thus is he brought to the king of terrors, without hope in his death.

VI. The royal corpse was brought to Samaria, and buried there, (v. 37.) and thither were brought the bloody chariot and bloody armor in which he

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 10—28. Unprincipled teachers are sufficiently pliable in matters of religion: they carefully avoid the imputation of bigotry; they make great pretensions to candor, and even treat the most fundamental truths of Revelation, as matters of indifference or uncertainty: but the same men are exceedingly tenacious of their own interests, and stubborn in their own concerns. Whereas we ought to be as pliant as the willow, where our own ease, credit, advantage, or indulgence are at stake; and as firm as the sturdy oak, in standing up for the great things, which relate to the glory of God, and the salvation of souls.—We must not expect exemption from hardship and ill usage; and need not wonder, if we eat the bread of affliction, and are even rewarded with blows, imprisonment, and cruel mockings: and when princes, false teachers and apostates unite against the servants of God, even the remnant of his people will often be afraid to interfere in their behalf.—Alas! how should we be ashamed to complain of what we in this day call trials, when we consider what the servants of God formerly endured!—Nothing can by any means harm us, if we continue faithful, and meekly valiant for the truth: the Lord will remove every aspersion from our characters, and bear testimony to his truth, in his due time: and some will profit by our warnings, though others rush headlong on ruin.—Little do unbelievers suspect how many legions of crafty, malicious, and powerful enemies are unwearied in plotting their destruction; restrained by no hand, but that of Him whom they despise and disobey. (P. O. Job 1: 6—12.)—The whole multitude of those, 'who privily bring in damnable heresies,' or propagate infidelity with vast industry and ingenuity, speak and write no other things, than are suggested to them by the prompter behind the curtain! Let us then fear suppressing our convictions, and returning back to sin after professions of repentance, lest Satan should thus prevail against us. For if he obtain leave to deceive, the disposition of our hearts, to prefer a flattering lie to a humbling truth that opposes our inclinations, will give him such an advantage, that every attempt of others to prevent his success, will only exasperate the mind to persecution or blasphemy. SCOTT.

Verse 30.

Perhaps Ahab was secretly alarmed by the solemnity of Micaiah's address, though he scorned to desist from his enterprise; or he was aware, he should be peculiarly aimed at by the Syrian forces. But Jehoshaphat meant no harm, and suspected none: yet in such a case, the wisdom of the serpent was as needful, as the harmlessness of the dove. (Matt. 10:16—18. 1 Cor. 14:20—25, v. 20.) SCOTT.

Verses 32—35.

Ahab, notwithstanding all his precaution, could not escape the destined blow.—Perhaps Ahab did not think the wound would prove pass, when the captains of the chariots perceived that it was not the king of Israel, [i] that they turned back from pursuing him.

34 And a certain man drew a bow * at a venture, [k] and smote the king of Israel between the † joints of the harness: wherefore he said unto the driver of his chariot, Turn thine hand, and carry me out of the host; for I am ‡ wounded.

35 And the battle § increased that day: and the king was stayed up in his chariot against the Syrians, and [l] died at even: and the blood ran out of the wound into the ‖ midst of the chariot.

36 And [m] there went a proclamation throughout the host about the going down of the sun, saying, [n] Every man to his city; and every man to his own country.

37 So the king died, and [¶] was brought to Samaria; and they buried the king in Samaria.

38 And one washed the chariot in the pool of Samaria, [o] and the dogs licked up his blood, and they washed his armor, according unto the word of the LORD which he spake.

39 Now [p] the rest of the acts of Ahab, and all that he did, and [q] the ivory house which he made, and all the cities that he built, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel?

40 So Ahab [r] slept with his fathers; and [s] Ahaziah his son reigned in his stead.

B. C. 914. 41 ¶ And [t] Jehoshaphat the son of Asa began to reign over Judah in the fourth year of Ahab king of Israel.

42 Jehoshaphat was [u] thirty and five years old when he began to reign; and he reigned twenty and five years in Jerusalem: [x] and his mother's name was Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi.

43 And [y] he walked in all the ways of Asa his father, [z] he turned not aside from it, [a] doing that which was right in the eyes of the LORD: nevertheless [b] the high places were not taken away; for the people offered and burnt incense yet in the high places.

44 And Jehoshaphat [c] made peace with the king of Israel.

45 Now [d] the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat, and his might that he showed, and how he warred, [e] are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?

46 And [f] the remnant of the sodomites, which remained in the days of his father Asa, he took out of the land.

47 There was then [g] no king in Edom: a deputy was king.

48 [h] Jehoshaphat  made [i] ships of Tharshish to go [k] to Ophir for gold: but [l] they went not; for the ships were broken at [m] Ezion-geber.

49 Then said Ahaziah the son of Ahab unto Jehoshaphat, Let my servants go with thy servants in the ships: might but send his servants with some effects on board Jehoshaphat's ships, he refused. Better buy wisdom dear, than be without it; but experience is therefore said to be the mistress of fools, because they are fools that will not learn till they are taught by experience, and particularly, the danger of associating with wicked people.

Now Jehoshaphat's reign appears here to have been none of the longest, but one of the best. 1. It was none of the longest, (v. 42.) but then 25 years added to his father's happy 41, give us a grateful idea of the flourishing condition of the kingdom of Judah, and of religion in it, for a great while, even when things were very bad, on all accounts, in the kingdom of Israel. If Jehoshaphat reigned not so long as his father, to balance that, he had not those blemishes on the latter end of his reign, that his father had; (2 Chr. 16: 9, 10, 12.) and it is better for a man that has been in reputation for wisdom and honor, to die in the midst of it, than to outlive it. 2. Yet it was one of the best, both in respect of piety and prosperity. (1.) He did well, v. 43. yet every man's character has some but or other, so had his; the high places were not taken away, no, not out of Judah and Benjadied, v. 38. Now Naboth's blood was avenged, (ch. 21: 19.) and that word of David, as well as Elijah's word, was fulfilled, (Ps. 68: 23.) That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs in the same. The dogs licking the guilty blood, was not only in fulfilment of the prophecy, but perhaps designed to represent the terrors that prey on the guilty soul after death.

Lastly. The story of Ahab is here concluded in the usual form, v. 39, 40.

V. 41—53. Here is, I. A short account of the reign of Jehoshaphat, of which we shall have a much fuller narrative. His confederacy with Ahab in war, we have already found dangerous to him, and his confederacy with Ahaziah his son in trade, sped no better, v. 48. See 2 Chr. 20: 35, 36. While they were preparing to sail, they were exceedingly damaged and disabled by a storm, broken at Ezion-geber, which a prophet gave Jehoshaphat to understand was a rebuke to him for his league with wicked Ahaziah, 2 Chr. 20: 37. Therefore, as we are told here, (v. 49.) when Ahaziah desired a second time to be a partner with him, or, if that could not be obtained, that he

He pleased God, and God blessed him with strength and success; his death is spoken of, (v. 50.) to shut up his story; yet, in the history of the kings of Israel, we find mention of him afterward, 2 K. 3: 7

II. The beginning of the story of Ahaziah the son of Ahab, (v. 51—53.) his reign was very short, not two years. Some sinners God makes quick work with. A very bad character is here given him; he not only kept up Jeroboam's idolatry, but the worship of Baal likewise: though he had heard of the ruin of Jeroboam's family, and had seen his own father drawn into destruction by the prophets of Baal, who had often been proved false prophets, yet he received no instruction, took no warning, but followed the example of his wicked father, and the counsel of his more wicked mother Jezebel, still living. Miserable are the children that not only derive a stock of corruption from their parents, but are thus taught by them to trade with it; and most unhappy parents, they that help to damn their children's souls.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 29—53. Those, who are rebellious against God, and injurious to his people, will not often be very faithful or grateful to their friends. Self-love is their supreme principle, to which all other considerations must be sacrificed; and the children of God are seldom so politic as the children of the wicked one. When, however, the Lord has rebuked his offending people, He will mark that difference between them and his enemies, which they did not sufficiently observe. Yet sincere endeavors to do good are the proper evidences and effects of saving faith: and the concurring reproofs of God's word and rod will lead the upright believer to repent of every transgression, and to bring forth fruits meet for repentance: whilst hardened sinners rush forward, unawed and unmoved, in the ways which have led others before them into everlasting misery. SCOTT.

is mentioned as their place of destination, in 2 Chr. 20:36, 37. and here they are said to 'go to Ophir:' but see note there. Bochart thinks there was a place called Tharshish in the Indian Ocean, near to Ophir. Sir W. Betham regards it as a general term, like the phrase East or West Indies. See his 'Gael and Cymbri.' Ezion-geber.] Said to have its name from a line of rocks near the harbor, standing up like a man's back-bone. On these Gill supposes the vessels to have been wrecked. ED.

V. 51. Jehoshaphat began to reign in the 4th yr. of Ahab, who reigned 22 yrs. (41) yet Ahaziah succeeded Ahab, in the 17th yr. of Jehoshaphat. This occasions some difficulty: but learned men suppose, that the chronology of the kings of Israel was adjusted to that of the kings of Judah. Now Ahab began to reign, after Asa had entered on his 38th year, and Asa died before the end of his 41st year. (16:29. 2 Chr. 16: 13.) And Jehoshaphat began to reign in the same year, which thus was reckoned both to Asa and Jehoshaphat. Ahab therefore is computed to have reigned 4 years in Asa's time, and 18 in Jehoshaphat's, including a part of the year in which Asa died, and in which Jehoshaphat succeeded him: though Ahab did not live till Jehoshaphat had fully completed his 17th year; having died nearer the beginning of the year, than Asa had done.—It is difficult to make this intelligible to persons not acquainted with the Jewish method of computing time; who, (whether in days or years,) take in both the first and last of the account, as if entire, even though only a small part of each had actually passed. Thus Ahaziah, having reigned part of the 17th year of Jehoshaphat, and part of the 18th, (for he died in the 18th,) is said to have reigned two years. (Note, 16:8—14.) SCOTT.

On the character of David.] Dr. Chandler considers that the expression 1 Sam. 13:14. is used in opposition to the character and conduct of Saul. It means one who should act prudently, and obey the commandments of God delivered him by his prophets, and whom, therefore, God would thus far approve and continue to favor. [One whose ruling motive of action is obedience to God's will: whose constant prayer is, 'thy will be done.'] Thus it is interpreted by Paul, (Acts 13:22,) 'I have found David, a man after my own heart, who shall execute my will.' Dr. C. cites many places of Scripture to confirm this, and adds, 'David certainly was a wise, just, munificent, and prosperous prince; but he had private faults, and those great ones. These, however, were not inconsistent with this character of "a man according to God's heart." For, if he was such a prince as God intended him to be, by faithfully executing his orders, and bringing to pass those great events, he was raised up by God to accomplish, he thus far acted "according to the heart," i. e. the purpose and will "of God," and thereby, in this respect, rendered himself well pleasing and acceptable to Him. The particular purposes for which God advanced David were, 1. That by his steady adherence to the one true God, and the religion He established by Moses, David might be an illustrious example to all that should reign after him. 2. To save his people from the Philistines, and all enemies, accomplishing the promise, Gen. 15: 18. 3. To exalt the glory of his people Israel, and render them a flourishing and happy people by the wisdom and justice of his government.—In these, he faithfully performed all the pleasure of God. He was therefore "a man after God's own heart," in the proper, original sense of the expression.'

Poole's view of 1 Sam. 13:14. is, 'Such a man as I desire, one who will fulfil all the desires of my heart, and not oppose them as thou (i. e. Saul) dost.'

Vain cavils appear to have arisen from not considering that the phrase may be interpreted, with equal propriety, as referring to the divine purpose, as to designate peculiar favor and affection. The latter undoubtedly was true, yet the former is most clearly the meaning here. Surely we may learn hence how God overrules all things to his own praise.

Robinson says, We admire the exceeding grace of God in David's spiritual attainments; and when we consider the depth of his contrition, the strength of his faith, the fervor of his love, the activity of his obedience, we do not fear to assert, that, in this sense, 'he found favor before God, and was a man after his own heart.'

Yonge observes, Too true and sad it is that David fell, with all the aggravations of accumulated guilt. He stands an alarming memento of the frailty of man in his best estate. Excuse there can be none. However strong temptations are, we have, or may have power to resist them. But what was his anguish! how deep his sorrow! how sincere his repentance Sincere we may be sure it was, for God forgave him. True sorrow consists in a deep grief that we have erred, with continual recollection of our fault, with a future fear of ourselves, and a return to every duty with double assiduity. Such was the repentance of David. He returned from his fall to the most diligent performance of his duties; and though he felt he was forgiven by God, he could scarcely forgive himself. He occasionally bursts out into condemnation of himself, and grief at times overpowers him. He continues to the end of his days serving God and man. Never was repentance more severe, or sorrow more keen; so that he may justly be said, (his repentance included, though not his fall,) to be a man after God's own heart.

Delany says, David, in his personal character, is vastly superior to any one hero of all antiquity. It is indeed a mixed character, and where is the character that is not so? Is it fair to consider David only in the light of guilt? or should he, in common justice, be estimated as all men are, by the main of his life? Millions have fallen, have sinned, as David did; but who ever repented and recovered like him? Revolve his whole life before the matter of Uriah; it is almost one train of wise, generous, pious, and valiant conduct. Revolve his whole life from the hour of this guilt, and it is little else than one train of humiliation and repentance before God, and this, too, after assurance of pardon from God Himself, by his prophet. Or, if he varied his conduct, it was only from penance to praise; to turn all his thoughts and attention, to employ his whole heart and soul, to the glory and in the service of God—of that God who pardoned all his sins, and crowned him with mercy and loving-kindness. And if, after all this, the Scriptures are to be reviled, for styling this man, in this character, 'a man after God's own heart,' what is to be reverenced?—Again, I challenge al mankind to produce any instance, from the foundation of the world, wherein virtue was so signally rewarded, and guilt so signally chastised as in that of David, consequently, to those who look most to rewards and punishments, from a solicitude for the interests of virtue there is no case in which true religion and true virtue are so nearly and intimately interested, as in the history of David's rise, fall, and recovery. HENRY abr.

If we except the abuse of the paternal and amatory feelings, for which 'no man suffered more in his body, soul and domestic affairs, we have a just view of David's well endowed, well balanced, well harmonized, and almost perfect character, in these few but glowing words of Dr. Delany, 'To sum up all: David was a true believer, a zealous adorer of God, teacher of his law and worship, and inspirer of his praise! A glorious example, a perpetual and inexhaustible fountain of true piety. A consummate and unequalled hero; a skilful and fortunate captain; a steady patriot; a wise ruler; a faithful, generous and magnanimous friend; and, what is yet rarer, a no less generous and magnanimous enemy. A true penitent, a divine musician, a sublime poet, and an inspired prophet. By birth a peasant; by merit a prince! In youth a hero, in manhood a monarch, and in age a saint!' ED.

AN EXPOSITION,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES,

UPON THE SECOND BOOK OF KINGS.

THIS second book of the Kings, the Septuagint, numbering from Samuel, calls the fourth: some think it might better have been made to begin with the 51st v. of the foregoing ch. where the reign of Ahaziah begins. The prophets outshone their princes; therefore, as far as they go, the history shall be accounted for in them. Here is, I. Elijah fetching fire from heaven, and ascending in fire to heaven, ch. 1, 2. II. Elisha working many miracles, both for prince and people, Israelites and foreigners, ch. 3—7. III. Hazael and Jehu anointed, the former for the correction of Israel, the latter for the destruction of the house of Ahab, and of the worship of Baal, ch. 8—10. IV. The reigns of several of the kings, both of Judah and Israel, ch. 11—16. V. The captivity of the ten tribes, ch. 17. VI. The good and glorious reign of Hezekiah, ch. 18—20. VII. Manasseh's wicked reign, and Josiah's good one, ch. 21—23. VIII. The destruction of Jerusalem by the king of Babylon, ch. 24, 25. This history, in the several passages of it, confirms that observation of Solomon, That righteousness exalts a nation, but sin is the reproach of any people. HENRY.

This book is merely a continuation of the preceding, to which it is joined in the Hebrew Canon: the remarks therefore already made on that, in a great measure apply to this.—It contains the history of above 300 years.—In Israel the kings were uniformly idolatrous and wicked: and, though the labors of Elijah, Elisha, and other prophets, were prospered to preserve a considerable number of the people from the general contagion; yet the measure of their national iniquity was soon filled up: so that they were conquered and carried captive by the kings of the Assyrians, and dispersed among the Gentiles, no more, as a collected body, to be restored to their own land. Their country was, after this, planted by the conquerors with a mingled people, who established a corrupt and partial worship of JEHOVAH, from whom originated the nation and religion of the Samaritans. These events began to take place considerably above 100 years before the Babylonish captivity.—In Judah indeed some remarkable revivals of religion took place under the pious princes of David's family, and by means of the faithful labors of the prophets: but after the death of pious Josiah, the nation became almost universally corrupt; and the melancholy account closes with the destruction of the city and temple, the desolation of the country, and the enslaving and carrying away of the inhabitants, by the Chaldeans.—As all the prophets, (commonly so called,) whose writings have been preserved, lived in the latter part of this period; (those excepted who lived during or after the captivity;) and as they continually refer to the facts recorded in this history; we may consider all their predictions as sanctioning, by their accomplishment, the divine authority of the narrative; though it does not contain any express prophecy, the completion of which extended much beyond the term of the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. CHAP. I. V. 1—8. We have here, Ahaziah, the wicked king of Israel, under God's rebukes, both by his providence and his prophet; his rod and his word.

I. He is crossed in his affairs. How can those expect to prosper, that do evil in the sight of the Lord, and provoke Him to anger? When he rebelled against God, Moab rebelled against him, and revolted from their long subjection to the kings of Israel, v. 1. If men break their covenants with us, and withdraw their duty, we must reflect on our breach of covenant with God, and the neglect of our duty to Him. Sin weakens and impoverishes us. Comp. on ch. 8: 22.

II. He is seized with sickness from a severe accident; perhaps it threw him into a fever, v. 2. Wherever we go, there is but a step between us and death. The cracked lattice is as fatal to the son, when God pleases, as the bow drawn at a venture, to the father. Job 18: 9, 10. He is never safe, that has God for his Enemy.

III. In his distress, he sends messengers to inquire of the god of Ekron (a despicable town of the Philistines, Zech. 9: 7.) whether he should recover or no, v. 2. And here, 1. His inquiry was very foolish. We should be more thoughtful of our duty than our fortune; what will become of us after death, than how, or when, or where, we shall die; and more desirous to be told how to conduct ourselves well in sickness, and get good to our souls by it, than whether we shall recover. 2. His sending to Baal-zebub was very wicked; no less a reproach to his reason than to his religion. Baal-zebub signifies the lord of a fly; one of their Baals, that, perhaps, gave his answers either by the power of the demons, or the craft of the priests, with a humming noise, like that of a great fly; or that had (as they fancied) rid their country of the swarms of flies wherewith it was infested, or of some pestilential disease brought among them by flies. Perhaps this dunghill-deity was as famous then, as the oracle of Delphos was, long after, in Greece. In the N. T. the prince of the devils is called Beel-zebub; (Matt. 12: 24. [where see note:]) for the gods of the Gentiles were devils, and

Verse 2.

The lattice, through which Ahaziah fell, is supposed to have had some curious ornamental net-work, which being decayed, gave way when he leaned on it. The Baal generally worshipped in Israel at that time, was the god of the Zidonians; but Baal-zebub was the god of Ekron in Philistia: for they 'had lords many, and gods many.' Perhaps Ahaziah had been making preparations for reducing the Moabites, and, impatient to march against them, desired, on that account, to know whether he should recover or not. ID.

Through the lattice in his upper chamber.] Though it is not necessary to understand exactly every word of Scripture, yet it is certainly worth while, if possible. The Heb. here is bead sebakah badlyyato, per cancellum in cœnaculum suum, Through the lattice into his supper-room. Mont. Per cancellos cœnaculi sui, Vulg. i. e. through the lattices, or bars of his supper room. Wilkinson says, that the ancient Egyptians gave entertainments in the ground floor, or in the second story of their houses, all which agrees with our transl. 'upper chamber': and Shaw says, 'all the windows of [modern] eastern houses open into the court, except a latticed window, or balcony, which sometimes looks into the streets.' (Comp. cut, 2 K. 9: 30.) Wilkinson also describes the ancient Egyptian houses as 'of crude brick plastered, and having frequently a ground floor, and an upper story with a terrace cooled by the air, which a wooden mulquf conducted down the slope.' This is still used in the E. and is of planks, nailed side by side on transverse beams, forming a shelving roof, facing and open to the wind, with one or both sides closed, and of similar materials. Sometimes the interior was laid out in a series of chambers, encompassing a square court.' Jahn says, the Jews had a 'kind of ventilator which rose from the centre of the flat roof, 10 cubits broad, and looked like a turret. It was hollow, open to the N. and conveyed cool air into the rooms below. [Perhaps, 'through a lattice.'] The alyyah, Gr. hyperoon, is more appropriately the chamber over the porch; it extends from the interior of the front side into the court, its roof is supported by two columns only, and the front of it has no wall. In it princes receive ambassadors, transact business, and dispense justice. Here Christ seems to have been tried, Luke 22: 61, 62, &c. and comp. 1 K. 7: 7. and Esth. 5: 1. It opens directly upon 4 Now therefore thus saith the LORD, * Thou shalt not come down from that bed on which thou art gone up, [n] but shalt surely die. And Elijah departed.

5 And when the messengers turned back unto him, he said unto them, Why are ye now turned back?

6 And they said unto him, There came a man up to meet us, and said unto us, Go, turn again unto the king that sent you, and say unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Is it not because there is not a God in Israel, that thou sendest to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. Death meets men in the most unexpected places and forms, but always under the direction of the all-wise and righteous God. If reconciled to Him by faith in the Savior, and walking in his ways, 'death is ours,' and can never come in a wrong time or manner: but to the impenitent and unbelieving he is and must be 'the king of terrors.'—False religion amuses men's minds, and gratifies a vain curiosity: but the Bible declares the way of acceptance, and the path of duty; and, without informing us of the events of our future lives, or the time and manner of our death, it teaches us to be always ready; and instructs us how to behave under every dispensation of Providence, and thus to find comfort under them all, and derive benefit from them.—Men are prone to act, as if there were no God; and as if they were left to take care of themselves, as well as to spend their lives in following their own inclinations: hence they are so readily induced to yield to every temptation, and to make rapid progress in wickedness, when in pursuit of the objects which they idolize, or when afraid of losing them.—Those who would be valiant for the truth, and in the cause of God, before the great ones of this world, must learn temperance, and frugality; and evince that they neither envy nor covet their luxuries and embellishments, but are indifferent about all other things, compared with the glory of God and the salvation of immortal souls. After all, our common version really seems as good as any. A cut, showing several lattices, is given of an outside corner of the 'tombs of the Memlook kings' in Cairo, Egypt. The apartment is 15 to 20 ft. from the ground, and the building has two steeples, the base of one of which is given. ED.

Verses 3, 4.

When a king of Israel sent to inquire of a heathen oracle, he proclaimed to the Gentiles his want of confidence in JEHOVAH: as if the only nation favored with revelation, and the knowledge of the true God, had been the only nation in which no God was known! Elijah departed, yet did not conceal himself; but continued so near to the same place, that the captains and their soldiers readily found him. (9, 10.) SCOTT.

10 And Elijah answered and said to the captain of fifty, [t] If I be a man of God, then [u] let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And there came down fire from heaven, [x] and consumed him and his fifty.

11 [y] Again also he sent unto him another captain of fifty, with his fifty: and he answered and said unto him, [z] O man of God, thus hath the king said, Come down quickly.

12 And Elijah answered, and said unto them, [a] If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven and consume thee and thy fifty. And the fire of God came down from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty.

13 And [b] he sent again a captain of the third fifty with his fifty: and the third captain of fifty went up, and came and * fell on his knees before Elijah, and [c] besought him, and said unto him, [d] O man of God, I pray thee, let my life, and the life of these fifty thy servants, be precious in thy sight.

14 Behold, there came fire down from heaven, and burnt up the two captains of the former fifties, with their fifties: therefore let my * life now be precious in thy sight.

15 And the angel of the LORD said unto Elijah, Go down with him; [f] be not afraid of him. And he arose, and went down with him unto the king.

16 And he said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, [g] Forasmuch as thou hast sent messengers to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron, is it not because there is no God in Israel to inquire of his word? therefore thou shalt not come down off that bed, on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die.

18 Now the rest of the acts of Ahaziah making any good improvement of the warning given him: no external alarms will startle and soften secure sinners, but rather exasperate them.

II. The captain sent with his fifty soldiers, v. 9. Elijah was now so far from absconding, as formerly, that he makes a bold appearance on the top of a hill, some think Carmel; experience of God's protection makes him more bold. The captain calls him a man of God, not that he believed him to be so,* or reverenced him as such a one, but because he was commonly called so; had he really looked upon him as a prophet, he would not have attempted to make him his prisoner; and command him to surrender at the word of a king.

III. Elijah calls for fire from heaven, to consume this haughty, daring sinner; not to secure himself, he could have done that some other way; nor to avenge himself, it was not his own cause he appeared and acted in; but to prove his mission, and to reveal the wrath of God from heaven, against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. It was not long since Elijah had fetched fire from heaven, to consume the sacrifice, (1 K. 18: 38.) in token of God's acceptance of it as an atonement for the people; but they having slighted that, now the fire falls on the sinners themselves, v. 10. See here, 1. What an interest the prophets had in heaven; Elijah did but speak, and it was done; he that formerly had fetched water from heaven, now fetches fire. O the power of prayer! Isa. 45: 11. 2. What an interest heaven had in the prophets! God was always ready to plead their cause. Doubtless Elijah did this by a divine impulse, and yet our Savior would not allow the disciples to draw it into a precedent, Luke 9: 54.

IV. This is repeated a second time; would one think it? obstinate sinners must be convinced and conquered, at last, by the fire of hell, for fire from heaven, it seems, will not do it. Another captain is ready with his fifty, who, in his blind rage against the prophet, and his blind obedience to the king, dares engage in that service which had been fatal to the last undertakers; this is as impudent and imperious as the last, and more in haste; [e] Come down quickly, the king's business requires haste; come down, or I will fetch thee down.' Elijah relents not, but calls for another flash of lightning, which instantly lays this captain and his fifty dead on the spot; they that will sin like others, must expect to suffer like them; God is inflexibly just.

V. The third captain humbled himself, and cast himself on the mercy of God and Elijah. It does not appear that Ahaziah ordered him to do so, but he took warning by the fate of his predecessors, and begged for his life and the lives of his soldiers, acknowledging their own evil deserts, and the prophet's power, v. 13, 14. Note, There is nothing to be got by contending with God: if we would prevail with Him, it must be by supplication; if we would not fall before Him, we must bow before Him; and those are wise, who learn submission from the fatal consequences others entail by their obstinacy.

VI. Elijah more than grants the request of this third captain; never any found it in vain to cast themselves on the mercy of God. This captain not only has his life spared, but is permitted to carry his point; Elijah, being so commanded by the angel, goes down with him to the king, v. 15. Thus he shows that he, before, refused to come, not because he feared the king or court, but because he would not be imperiously summoned, and would not lessen the honor of his Master; he magnifies his office. He comes boldly to the king, and tells him, to his face, what he had before sent to him, (v. 16.) that he should surely and shortly die; he mitigates not the sentence, either for fear of the king's displeasure, or in pity to his misery. So thunder-struck is Ahaziah with this message, when it comes from the prophet's own mouth, that neither he, nor any about him, durst offer him any violence, nor so much as give him an affront; but out of that den of lions he comes unhurt, like Daniel. Who can harm those whom God will shelter?

Lastly, The prediction is accomplished in a few days; Ahaziah died, (v. 17.) and, dying childless, left his kingdom to his brother Jehoram; his father reigned wickedly 22 years, he not 2; sometimes the wicked live, become old, yea, are mighty in power; but they who therefore promise themselves prosperity in impiety, may, perhaps,

* On the contrary, this belief seems to have been the very aggravation of his sin, which called for punishment: otherwise his duty was obedience. Ed.

On the top of a hill.] Carmel was far N. or N. W. of Samaria, where Ahaziah lay, (Josh. 19: 26.) and the road to Ekron lay to the S. W. Had the prophet retired to mt. Carmel, the captain could not so readily have found him. SCOTT.

Verse 10.

No doubt Elijah was moved, to call for fire from heaven on these men, by immediate revelation. He was influenced by a holy zeal for the honor of the Lord, which was attacked in his person, as a man of God, by the worshippers of Baalim; for if he had been actuated by resentment or selfish passions, the fire from heaven would not have come at his word.—The officers and soldiers, who were slain, not only deserved death as idolaters, but doubtless they had been the instruments of Ahab and Jezebel in persecution: and the example would have salutary effects on many in Israel. (Dan. 3: 19—23. Luke 9: 51—56. Acts 12: 18, 19.) ID.

Verses 11, 12.

It is hard to say, which was on this occasion the more wonderful, the madness of the wounded and enfeebled Ahaziah, when the report of the awful event reached him, or the presumption of this officer and his soldiers: for the second attempt was made in a more peremptory and haughty manner, than the foregoing. But perhaps the former calamity was ascribed to chance. None of the persons concerned appear to have been convinced, that JEHOVAH had sent the fire from heaven, for this express purpose, in answer to the words of Elijah. (1 Sam. 6: 2—9.) SCOTT.

Verses 15, 16.

Elijah had so exasperated Jezebel and her party, by putting the prophets of Baal to death; and by the awful sentence on Ahab and Jezebel, and the whole family, denounced in the vineyard of Naboth; that he had no further prospect of doing them good. In general he lived in a retired manner; and labored among the inferior inhabitants, without exposing himself to the rage of the king: but on this occasion, he was especially commissioned to go to him, along with the captain and his fifty. And his presence and authoritative boldness, in delivering in person the solemn message before sent by the messengers, so dismayed Ahaziah, that he did not attempt any thing against him. ID.

CHAP. II.

Elijah, when about to be translated, cannot induce Elisha not to attend him in his progress, 1—7. With his mantle he divides Jordan, and they pass over, 8. Elijah allows conditionally of Elisha's request of a double measure of the Spirit, and is taken to heaven in a fiery chariot, 9—11. Elisha takes up Elijah's mantle; smites and divides Jordan with it, and passes over; and is received as Elijah's successor, 12—15. The sons of the prophets in vain seek for Elijah, 16—18. Elisha heals with salt the bad waters of Jericho, 19—22. Bears destroy the children that mock him, 23—25.

find themselves deceived; for, (as Bp. Hall observes here,) 'Some sinners live long, to aggravate their judgment, others die soon, to hasten it;' but it is certain that evil pursues sinners, and, sooner or later, will overtake them; nor will any thing fill the measure sooner than that complicated iniquity of Ahaziah; honoring the devil's oracles, and hating God's.

CHAP. II. In the close of the foregoing ch. we had a wicked king leaving the world in disgrace, here we have a holy prophet leaving it in honor; the departure of the former was his greatest misery, of the latter, his greatest bliss: men are as their end is.

V. 1—8. Elijah's times, and the events concerning him, are as little dated as those of any great man in scripture; we are not told of his age, nor in what year of Ahab's reign he first appeared, nor in what year of Joram's he disappeared; we therefore cannot conjecture how long he flourished; it is supposed about 20 years in all.

Here we are told,

I. God had determined to take him up into heaven by a whirlwind, v. 1. He probably let him know of his purpose, some time before, how that He would shortly take him from the world, not by death, but as Enoch, only causing him to undergo such a change as would be necessary to qualify him to be an inhabitant in that world of spirits; such as they shall undergo, who will be found alive at Christ's coming. It is not for us to say, why God would so honor Elijah above any other of the prophets; he was a man subject to like passions as we are, knew sin, yet never tasted death. Wherefore then is he thus dignified? We may suppose,—to recompense him for his past eminent and extraordinary services, and to encourage the sons of the prophets to tread in the steps of his zeal and faithfulness, and, whatever it cost them, to witness against the corruptions of the age they lived in; also that in the present dark and degenerate state of the church, God would thus give a very sensible proof of another life after this, and draw the hearts of the faithful few upward toward Himself, and that other life: he likewise looked forward to the evangelical dispensation, and, in the translation of Elijah, gave a type and figure of the ascension of Christ, and the opening of the kingdom of heaven to all believers. We are assured that if we have our conversation in heaven, while here on earth, we shall be there shortly, and happy there for ever.

II. Elisha had determined, as long as he continued on earth, to cleave to him, and not to leave him: Elijah seemed desirous to shake him off, v. 2, 4, 6. out of humility, so some; (God's favorites covet not to have it proclaimed before them, that they are favorites;) or rather, it was to try him, and make his constant adherence to him the more commendable, like Naomi's persuading Ruth to go back: in vain does Elijah entreat him; he resolves, whatever comes, I will not leave thee; and because he loved him, and desired to be edified by his holy, heavenly converse as long as he staid on earth; it had always been profitable, but, we may suppose, now, more so than ever. We should therefore do all the spiritual good we can, one to another, and get all we can, one by another, while we are together, because we are to be together but a while. He desired also to be satisfied concerning his departure, and to see him when he was taken up, that his faith might be confirmed, and his acquaintance with the invisible world increased. Let not those that follow Christ, come short by tiring at last.

III. Elijah, before his departure, visited the schools of the prophets, and took leave of them; it seems there were such schools in many of the cities of Israel, probably, even in Samaria itself; here we find sons of the prophets, considerable numbers, even at Beth-el, where one of the calves was, and at Jericho, which was lately built in defiance of a divine curse: thus, by these schools, God graciously made up in Israel for the want of the priests, and Levites, and the temple-service which were had in Judah. Much of God was among these prophets, and more were the children of the desolate than the children of the married wife; none of all the high priests were comparable to those two great men, Elijah and Elisha, who, for aught we know, never attended in the temple at Jerusalem. These seminaries which Elijah, probably, had been instrumental to found, he now visits, before his departure, to instruct, encourage, and bless them. Note, Those that are going to heaven themselves, ought to be concerned for those they leave behind, to leave with them their experiences, testimonies, counsels, and prayers, 2 Pet. 1: 15. When Christ said, with triumph, Now I am no more in the world, He added, with tenderness, But these are; Father, keep them.

IV. The sons of the prophets had intelligence, or suspected, by the solemnity of Elijah's farewell, that he was now shortly to be removed, and told Elisha, both at Bethel, (v. 3.) and at Jericho, v. 5. This they did to show how full they were of the thoughts of this matter, and big with ex-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9—18. The conduct of some persons, as impartially recorded in the Word of God, appears so infatuated, that we should scarcely be able to credit the account, did we not sometimes witness actions equally unaccountable. Often has it been observed, that men upon a death-bed, and aware that they could not recover, have appeared more trifling, profane, avaricious, morose, fierce, or cruel, than at any former period: so that those around them have been tempted, by their intolerable conduct, to wish them dead before the hour arrived! Some have even seemed to regret, with their dying lips, that they could do no more mischief in the world before they left it! And in many other ways men are continually acting in a manner inexplicable, except on the principles of the wise man; 'The heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart whilst they live, and after that they go to the dead.' (Ec. 9: 1—3. Matt. 2: 16—18.) —If the wicked face death in its most tremendous forms, to obtain or preserve the favor of an earthly prince, whose 'breath goeth forth, and he returneth to his dust, and all his thoughts perish;' what danger and hardship ought we not to welcome in the service of the everlasting God, who can give us the gracious recompense of eternal life. (Ps. 146: 3—6.)—There are proper seasons for different methods of behaving towards sinners, and we must ask wisdom of God to direct us: and, as the same action may be either right or wrong, according to the principle from which it springs, we should look well to our own spirits, and be candid in judging our brethren. It is, however, our general rule, 'not to be overcome of evil, but to overcome evil with good.' —The judgments of God under the Christian dispensation are commonly spiritual: and the more mildly we behave to those, wh insult and injure us for the Lord's sake, the more terrible punishment will He at length inflict on them. But our God is ever ready to forgive the humble supplicant, however rebellious he has been; and the way to prevail with Him is to bow before Him. We therefore should be followers of Him, and be ready to pray for and favor our bitterest enemies, especially when, under any alarm of conscience they entreat us so to do. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 2. Elijah might intend by this proposal to make trial of the strength of Elisha's attachment; or perhaps he longed for retirement, and shunned ostentation. But Elisha expressed his determination to enjoy the pleasure and reap the benefit of his company to the last; and, if it might be, to witness his translation: and this he confirmed with a most solemn asseveration. As the life and soul of man entirely depend on God, to mention them in a solemn oath, either alone, or along with Him, was deemed equivalent to swearing by the name of the LORD. Beth-el.] (M. R.—1 K. 12.26—33. 13:1,2.) 'By "the sons of the prophets" are meant the scholars of the prophets, whom they educated and trained up in religion and piety. It seems to me very probable, they were such ministers to the prophets, as the evangelists were to the apostles; whom the prophets sent to publish their prophecies and instructions to the people, where they could not go themselves.' Patrick.—Elisha, however, would not allow them to interrupt the composure of Elijah's mind, at this solemn season, by any lamentations: it is probable, that he forbade them publicly to speak of it, lest multitudes should be collected to witness the event; or he counselled them to be calm, and not to disquiet themselves, for the Lord would make up the loss. pectation of the event, and to admonish Elisha to prepare for the loss: know we not that our nearest relations, and dearest friends, must shortly be taken from us? let us then carefully do the duty of every relation, that we may reflect on it with comfort, when it comes to be dissolved. Elisha knew it too well, therefore did not care to hear it, or to be interrupted in his contemplations, or, in the least, diverted from attendance on his master; he speaks not peevishly, or in contempt, but as one that was himself, and would have them, composed and sedate, and with an awful silence expecting the event; I know it, be silent, Zech. 2: 13. They went themselves to witness it at a distance, though they might not closely attend, v. 7. intending to satisfy their curiosity, but God so ordered it, that they might be eye-witnesses of the honor Heaven did that prophet, who was despised and rejected of men. God's works are well worthy our notice; when a door is opened in heaven, the call is, Come up hither, come and see.

V. The miraculous dividing of the Jordan was the preface to Elijah's translation into the heavenly Canaan, as it had been to the entrance of Israel into the earthly Canaan, v. 8. The other side Jordan, was his native country; there he might be near the place where Moses died; thus also honor might be put on that part of the country, which was most despised. He and Elisha might have gone over Jordan by a ferry, as other passengers did, but God would magnify Elijah's exit, as He did Joshua's entrance, by dividing the river, Josh. 3: 7. Moses with his rod divided the sea, so Elijah with his mantle divided Jordan, both the badges of their office; these waters, of old, yielded to the ark, now, to the prophet's mantle, which, to those that wanted the ark, was an equivalent token of God's presence: death is the Jordan which the faithful must all pass, and they find a way through it, safe and comfortable; the death of Christ has divided those waters, that the ransomed of the Lord may pass over; O death, where is thy sting? thy hurt, thy terror?

V. 9—12. I. Elijah here makes his will, and leaves Elisha his heir, now anointing him to be a prophet in his room, more than when he cast his mantle on him, 1 K. 19: 19.

1. Elijah, being greatly pleased with the constancy of Elisha's affection and attendance, bade him ask what blessing he should leave him at parting; he does not say, (as Bp. Hall well observes, 'Ask of me when I am gone, in heaven I shall be better able to befriend thee,' but, 'Ask before I go.' Our friends on earth may be spoken to, and can give us an answer, but we know not that we can have access to any friend in heaven but Christ, and God in Him; Abraham is ignorant of us.

2. Elisha asks not for wealth, or honor, or exemption from trouble, but to be qualified for the service of God and his generation; he asks, (1.) For the Spirit; not that the gifts and graces of the Spirit were in Elijah's power to give, therefore he says not, 'Give me the Spirit,' (he knew very well it was God's gift,) but, 'Let it be upon me, intercede with God for this, for me.' Christ bade his disciples ask what they would, not one, but all, and promised to send the Spirit, with much more authority and assurance than Elijah could. (2.) For his spirit; because he was to be a prophet in his room, to carry on his work, to father the sons of the prophets, and face their enemies; having the same perverse generation to deal with, if he have not Elijah's spirit, he has not strength according to the day. (3.) For a double portion of his spirit; he does not mean double to what Elijah had, but double to what the rest of the prophets had, from whom so much would not be expected as from Elisha, who had been brought up under Elijah. It is a holy ambition to covet earnestly the best gifts, and those which will render us most serviceable to God and our brethren. Note, We all ought, both ministers and people, to set before us the examples of our predecessors, to labor after their spirit, and to be earnest with God for that grace which carried them through their work, and enabled them to finish well.

3. Elijah promises him what he asked, but under two provisos, v. 10. (1.) That he duly value it; this he teaches him to do, by calling it a hard thing; not too hard for God to do, but too great for him to expect. Those are best prepared for spiritual blessings, that are most sensible of their worth, and their own unworthiness to receive them. (2.) That he kept close to his master, even to the last, and was observant of him: If thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so, otherwise not. Or, perhaps, this was intended only as a sign; 'If God favor thee so far as to give thee a sight of me when I ascend, take that for a token that He will do this for thee, and depend on it.' Christ's disciples saw Him as-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. The Lord always acts with perfect wisdom, justice, goodness, and truth; but He does not always deign to explain to us the reasons of his conduct. In exempting sinners from merited condemnation, and in conferring unmerited blessings, He 'divideth to every man severally as He will.' (Acts 10: 34, 35.) As we know not the time of our departure, we should give diligence to be habitually ready: and we ought to mind our proper work with greater assiduity, if able, when we perceive that the time approaches. Whether ministers or private Christians, we are called to 'serve our generation;' and should aim to leave all around us deeply convinced of the nearness and reality of eternal things, and animated with the desire of glorifying God and doing good: and our example, exhortations, and prayers should especially be directed to these important objects, when we approach the solemn closing scene. (Note, 2 Pet. 1: 12—15.) Those who are called to succeed eminent men in arduous and important stations, and are conscious of their own insufficiency, are peculiarly encouraged to expect a double portion of the Spirit of God, that they may not disgrace their situations, or remain useless in them. Elijah did not give the least intimation of being prayed to as an intercessor, after he was gone to heaven; nay, his words imply the contrary, in a very decisive manner. If the request were not made before he was taken away, it would afterwards be too late.—Elisha seems only to have meant a double portion of the Spirit of prophecy, and of wisdom, courage, faith, and grace, to what was ordinarily bestowed on the prophets; but in the enlargedness of his desires he was led to use words, which may signify even double the portion which Elijah had possessed: and Elijah's answer seems to imply, that this was the import of them.—It appears from the history, that Elisha wrought twice as many miracles as Elijah had done: and being more constantly among the people as their example and instructer, for above 60 years, from his first calling by Elijah, he seems to have been favored with more extensive usefulness than he; though in other respects he may be considered as his inferior. (13 14.) Thus our Lord said to his apostles, (referring to the extensive usefulness of their labors, compared with that of his personal ministry, and to the number, variety, and long continuance of the miracles wrought by them,) 'Greater works than these shall ye do:' yet was He infinitely greater than they. cend, and were, thereupon, assured they should, in a little time, be filled with his Spirit, Acts 1: 8. Elisha, we may suppose, hereupon, prayed earnestly, Lord, show me this token for good.

II. Elijah is carried to heaven in a fiery chariot, v. 11. Like Enoch, he was translated, that he should not see death. Many curious questions might here be asked, which could not be answered. Let it suffice that we are told,

1. His Lord, when He came, found him talking with, instructing and encouraging Elisha, directing him in his work, and quickening him to it, for the good of those he left behind: Thinking of divine things is good, but talking of them (if it come from the heart) is better, because for edification, 1 Cor. 14: 4. Christ ascended as He was blessing his disciples.

2. His Lord sent for him a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, for brightness, not burning, (to render his ascension conspicuous, and illustrious,) either descending from the clouds, or (as Bp. Patrick thinks) running toward them on the ground. The souls of all the faithful are carried by an invisible guard of angels into Abraham's bosom; but Elijah being to carry his body with him, this heavenly guard was visible, not in a human shape, as usual, but in the form of a chariot and horses, that he may ride in state, in triumph, like a prince, like a conqueror, yea, more than a conqueror; the angels are called, in scripture, Cherubim and Seraphim, and their appearance here, though it may seem below their dignity, answers to both those names; Seraphim signifies fiery, and God is said to make them a flame of fire, Ps. 104: 4. Cherubim (as many think) signifies chariots, and they are called the chariots of God, Ps. 68: 17. And He is said to ride upon a cherub, (Ps. 18: 10.) to which perhaps there is an allusion in Ezekiel's vision of four living creatures, and wheels, like horses and chariots; in Zechariah's vision they are so represented, Zech. 1: 8.—6: 1. Comp. Rev. 6: 2, &c. See the readiness of the angels to do the will of God, even in the meanest services, for the good of them that shall be heirs of salvation.

3. The dearest friends must part; Elisha protested he would not leave him, yet is left behind, while Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven; the fire tends upward, the whirlwind helped to carry him through the atmosphere, and how swiftly he ascended to the world of holy and blessed spirits, we cannot conceive. Elijah had once, in a passion, wished he might die; yet God was so gracious to him, as not only not to take him at his word then, but to honor him with this singular privilege, that he should never see death; and by this instance, and that of Enoch, God showed how men should have left the world, if they had not sinned, not by death, but by a translation. He gave a glimpse of that life and immortality brought to light by the Gospel, of the glory reserved for the bodies of the saints, and the opening of the kingdom of heaven to all believers; it was also a figure of Christ's ascension.

III. Elisha pathetically laments his loss, but attends him with an encomium, v. 12. He saw it; thus he received the sign by which he was assured of the grant of the double portion of Elijah's spirit; he rent his own clothes, in token of his sense of his own and the public loss; though Elijah was gone triumphantly to heaven, this world could ill spare him, therefore his removal ought to be much regretted by the survivors. Surely their hearts are hard, whose eyes are dry, when God, by taking away faithful, useful men, calls for weeping and mourning. My father, my father! he saw his own condition like that of a fatherless child thrown on the world, and laments it accordingly. Christ, when he left his disciples, did not leave them orphans, (John 14: 15.) but Elijah must. The public had lost its best guard; the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. He would have brought them all to heaven, as in this chariot, if it had not been their own fault; they used not chariots and horses in their wars, but Elijah was to them, by his counsels, reproofs, and prayers, better than the strongest force of chariot and horse, and kept off the judgments of God; his departure was like the routing of an army, an irreparable loss. Better have lost all our men of war than this man of God.

V. 13—18. We have here, I. The tokens of God's presence with Elisha, and the marks of his elevation into Elijah's room, to be, as he had been, a father to the sons of the prophets, and the chariot and horsemen of Israel. He was possessed,

1. Of Elijah's mantle, the badge of his office, which, we may suppose, he put on, and wore, for his master's sake, v. 13. though in itself of small value, yet as a token of the descent of the Spirit on him, it was more than thousands of gold and silver. Elisha took it up, not as a sacred relic to be worshipped, but as a significant garment to be worn, a recompense for his own garments rent; he loved this cloak ever since it was first cast over him, 1 K. 19: 19. There are remains of great and good men, which ought to be gathered up and preserved by the survivors, their sayings, writings, examples, that as their works follow them in reward, they may stay behind in benefit.

2. Of Elijah's power to divide Jordan, v. 14. He returns to the prophets; Jordan was between him and them, he will try whether it will divide to make way for him, and by that he will know that God is with him, and that he has the double portion of Elijah's spirit. He made use of the mantle, as Elijah had done, (v. 8.) to signify that he designed to keep to his master's methods, and would not introduce any thing new, as those affect to do, that think themselves wiser than their predecessors. He applied to Elijah's God; does not ask, 'Where is Elijah?' either as poring on his loss, (as if he could not be easy now he was gone,) or as doubting of his happy state, (as if, like the sons of the prophets here, he knew not what was become of him,) or as curiously inquiring concerning the particulars of that state he was removed to; nor as expecting help from him; no, Elijah is happy, but is neither omniscient, nor omnipotent: but he asks, Where is the Lord God of Elijah? Now that Elijah was taken to heaven, God had abundantly proved Himself the God of Elijah; and when our creature-comforts are removed, we have a God to go to, that lives for ever; the God that Elijah served, and honored, and pleaded for, and adhered to, when all Israel had deserted Him. This honor is done to those who cleave to God in times of general apostasy, that God will be, in a peculiar manner, their God. It is the duty and interest of the saints on earth to inquire after God, and apply themselves to Him, as the Lord God of the saints gone before to heaven, the God of our fathers. It is very com-

Verse 11.

(M. R.—1.) Elijah's translation was doubtless performed by the ministration of angels, who caused the appearances and effects here described. The event was a distinguished honor put upon one, who had been peculiarly zealous for the honor of God, and had ventured all consequences in his cause, by opposing the idolatry of an apostate and persecuting age and nation. It was a public attestation of the doctrine of a future state of retributions, for the encouragement of God's suffering people; and it was also a prefiguration of the Redeemer's ascension. Verse 13.

The prophet went to heaven in the body; yet, as a token of the different state into which he was entered, and the change which had taken place, he dropped his mantle, or upper garment. (1 Cor. 15: 50—54. 2 Cor. 5: 1—4.) SCOTT.

Verses 16—18.

These sons of the prophets might think, that even in case Elijah was finally taken from them, his soul alone was gone to heaven; and that his body might be found, and buried with due honor: but perhaps they also doubted, whether he was really removed; or had only been carried to some other place in a supernatural manner, as he seems to fortable to those who inquire after God, that they know where to find Him; it is even He that is in his holy temple, (Ps. 11: 4.) and nigh to all who call upon Him, Ps. 145: 18. Those that walk in the spirit and steps of their godly, faithful predecessors, shall certainly experience the same grace that they experienced; Elijah's God will be Elisha's too; the Lord God of the holy prophets is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

3. Of Elijah's interest in the sons of the prophets, v. 15. Some of the college at Jericho, who had placed themselves conveniently near Jordan, to see what passed, were surprised to see Jordan divided before Elisha, and took that as a convincing evidence, that the spirit of Elijah did rest on him, and that therefore they ought to pay him the same respect and deference, as they had Elijah. Accordingly, they went to meet and congratulate him; they were trained up in the schools, Elisha was taken from the plough, yet, when they perceive that God is with him, and that this is the man whom He delights to honor, they readily submit to him, as their head and father; as the people to Joshua, when Moses was dead, Josh. 1: 17. Those that appear to have God's Spirit and presence with them, ought to have our esteem and best affections, notwithstanding the meanness of their extraction and education. Whomsoever God honors, we must. This ready submission, no doubt, was a great encouragement to Elisha, and helped to clear his call.

II. The needless search of the sons of the prophets for Elijah. Elisha consented not to their motion, till they overcame him with importunity, v. 17. Wise men may yield to that, for the sake of peace, and the good opinions of others, which yet their judgment is against, as needless and fruitless. The issue made them as much ashamed of their proposal, as they, by their importunity, had made Elisha ashamed of opposing it. This would make them the more willing to acquiesce in his judgment another time.

V. 19—25. Elisha had a double portion of Elijah's spirit, in that he wrought more miracles than he. Some reckon them in number just double. Two are recorded in these vs.—a miracle of mercy to Jericho, and of judgment to Beth-el, Ps. 101: 1.

I. Jericho was built in disobedience to a command, in defiance to a threatening; and at the expense of the lives of all the builder's children; yet, when built, it was not ordered to be demolished again, nor were God's prophets or people forbidden to dwell in it, but even within those walls, we find a nursery of piety. Hither Elisha came, to confirm the disciples with a more particular account of Elijah's translation, and here he staid while the fifty men were searching for him.

And, 1. The men of Jericho represented to him their grievance, v. 19. Some think it was not all the ground about Jericho, that was barren, and had bad water, but that part only where the sons of the prophets, here called the men of the city, had their lodgings. 2. He soon redressed their grievance. If salt had been proper to season the water, yet what could so small a quantity do towards it, and what the better for being in a new cruse? But thus they that would be helped, must be employed, and their faith and obedience tried. God's works of grace are wrought, not by any operations of ours, but in our observance of his institutions. He cast the salt into the spring of the waters, and so healed the streams, and the ground they watered. The way to reform men's lives, is, to renew their hearts. Make the tree good, and the fruit will be good. Purify the heart, and that will cleanse the hands. He did not pretend to do this by his own power, but in God's name. He is but the instrument, the channel through which God is pleased to convey this healing virtue. By doing them this kindness, with a Thus saith the Lord, they would be made the more willing, hereafter, to receive from him a reproof, admonition, or command, with the same preface. Thus saith the Lord, out of Elisha's mouth, must, ever after, be of mighty force with them. The cure was lasting, and not for the present only, v. 22. What God doeth, it shall be for ever. When He, by his Spirit, heals a soul, there shall be no more death nor barrenness; the property is altered; what was useless and offensive, becomes grateful and serviceable.

II. Here is a curse on the children of Beth-el. At Beth-el was another school of prophets, thither Elisha goes next; the scholars, no doubt, welcomed him with all possible respect, but the townsmen abused him. One of Jeroboam's calves was at Beth-el; this they were proud and fond of, and hated them that reproved them. The law did not empower them to suppress this pious academy, but we may suppose it was their usual practice to jeer the prophets as they went along the streets, to call them by some nickname or other, to expose them to contempt, prejudice their youth against them, and, if possible, drive them out of their town. Had this abuse to Elisha been the first offence of that kind, probably it would not have been so severely punished. But mocking the messengers of the Lord, and misusing the prophets, was one of the crying sins of Israel, 2 Chr. 36: 16.

1. The little children of Beth-el (the boys and girls playing in the streets; notice, it is likely, being come to the town of his approach) went out to meet him, not with hosannas, as they ought, but with scoffs; gathered about him, and mocked

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11—18. Angels delight to be employed in removing the saints to their glorious rest, in any way that the Lord pleases. (Notes, Gen. 24: 2—9. Luke 16: 22, 23. Heb. 1: 13, 14.) Yet the event, which is so joyful to them, often causes painful separations to those who are left behind: many, on these occasions, are bereft of such as have been more dear and useful to them, than the tenderest parent: yea, even the public has been deprived of some of its strongest bulwarks, though most men are insensible to the loss. (Note, Is. 57: 1, 2.) On these accounts it is allowable to grieve: but believers should be warned 'not to sorrow, as men without hope;' the separation will at length issue in a more joyful meeting, and the loss shall be made up to them. Though Elijah be removed, 'the LORD God of Elijah' lives; and, though the miraculous powers are withdrawn, the Gospel still is attended with a divine energy for the conversion and salvation of sinners. Oh, may that power be more abundantly experienced, wherever the Word of God is truly preached! And may we all seriously inquire, whether it be not suspended, retarded, or removed, through some criminal cause in us!—Having, however, the same exceeding great and precious promises, the same throne of grace, the same Mediator, the same powerful God and Father, as the primitive Christians had; if we have also the same 'precious faith,' we need not fear breaking through all difficulties, opposing enemies, and at last passing comfortably through the Jordan of death, as on dry ground. have been on former occasions. (M. R.—1 K. 18: 12—16.) Elisha, however, might fear lest they should suspect, if he persisted in refusing their request, that he was influenced by an undue desire of filling Elijah's honorable place; and the event tended to establish his authority. SCOTT.

"barren land," v. 21, means abortion. It cannot well refer to vegetable products, as Jericho was celebrated for fertility, was pleasant, and called the 'city of palms,' 2 Chr. 28: 15. The climate of Porto Bello was thought to produce analogous effects. Bruce says, "no beast of burden, &c. will breed at or near Sennaar. . . . My two grey-hounds and mule lived but a few weeks after I arrived. They seemed to have some inward complaint, for nothing appeared outwardly. Several kings have tried to keep lions, but no care could preserve them beyond the first rains. Two lived with a shekh's horses, kept 3 miles from Sennaar. Neither rose nor any species of jessamine grows here; no tree but the lemon flowers near the city, that I ever saw; the rose has been often tried, but in vain. This unfavorableness to propagation, seems owing to some noxious quality of the fat earth all around it, and ceases on removing from the fertile country to the sands. The soil of Sennaar is strongly impregnated with salt." This instance seems a parallel to Jericho.' ROB. CALM. which see. ED.

CHAP. III.

Jehoram reigns wickedly, 1—3. Mesha king of Moab revolts, 4, 5. Jehoram, Jehoshaphat, and the king of Edom, march against him; and being greatly distressed for want of water, they apply to Elisha, who sharply reproves Jehoram, but shows respect to Jehoshaphat, 6—14. He promises them water, and victory, 15—19. Plenty of water is sent; the Moabites are deceived by the appearance, and are entirely defeated, 20—24. The allied kings destroy the cities, spoil the country, and besiege Kir-haraseth, 25. The king of Moab, sacrificing his eldest son, causes them to raise the siege, 26, 27.

NOW [a]Jehoram the son of Ahab began to reign over Israel in Samaria, the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, and him, as if a fool, or one fit to make sport with: among other things that they used to jeer the prophets with, they had this particular taunt for him, Go up, thou bald-head; Go up, thou bald-head. It is wicked to reproach any for natural infirmities or deformities; it is adding affliction to the afflicted; and if they are as God made them, the reproach reflects on Him. But this was such a thing as scarcely deserved to be called a blemish, and would never have been turned to his reproach, if they had had any thing else to reproach him with. It was his character, as a prophet, that they designed to abuse. They bade him go up, perhaps reflecting on the assumption of Elijah: 'Thy master,' they say, 'is gone up; why dost not thou go up after him? Where is the fiery chariot? When shall we be rid of thee too?' These children said as they were taught; they had learned of their idolatrous parents to call foul names, and give bad language, especially to prophets. Perhaps their parents sent them out, and set them on, that, if possible, they might keep the prophet out of their town.

2. Here is a specimen of that ruin which came on Israel, at last, for misusing God's prophets, and of which this was intended to give them fair warning. Elisha heard their taunts, a good while, with patience; but, at length, the fire of holy zeal for God was kindled in his breast, and he turned and looked upon them, to try if a grave and severe look would shame or awe them; or to see if he could discern in their faces any marks of ingenuousness: but they were not ashamed, neither could they blush; therefore he cursed them in the name of the Lord, both imprecated and denounced the following judgment, not in personal revenge for the indignity to himself, but, as the mouth of divine justice, to punish the dishonor to God. His summons was immediately obeyed; two she-bears (bears perhaps robbed of their whelps) came out of an adjacent wood, and presently killed 42 children, v. 24. Now in this, (1.) The prophet must be justified, for he did it by divine impulse. Had the curse come from any bad principle, God would not have said, Amen, to it. Elisha knew, by the Spirit, the bad character of these children, what a generation of vipers they were; and what mischievous enemies they would be to God's prophets, if they should live to be men, who began so early to abuse them. He intended hereby to punish the parents, and to make them afraid of God's judgments. (2.) God must be glorified, as a righteous God that hates sin, and will reckon for it, even in little children. Let little children be afraid of speaking wicked words, for God notices what they say. Let them not mock at any for their defects in mind or body, but pity them rather; especially let them know it is at their peril, if they jeer God's people or ministers, and scoff at any for well-doing. Let parents that would have comfort in their children, train them up well, and do their utmost betimes to drive out the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts; for, (as Bp. Hall says,) 'In vain do we look for good of those children whose education we have neglected; and in vain do we grieve for those miscarriages which our care might have prevented.'

Elisha comes to Beth-el, and fears not the revenges of the bereaved parents; God, who bade him do what he did, he knew would bear him out. Thence he goes to Carmel, (v. 25.) where, it is probable, there was a religious house fit for retirement and contemplation. Thence he returned to Samaria, where, being a public place, this father of the prophets might be most serviceable. Bp. Hall observes here, 'That he can never be a profitable seer, who is either always or never alone.'

CHAP. III. We are now called to attend the public affairs of Israel, in which we shall find Elisha concerned. The house of Ahab is doomed to destruction; and though in this ch. we have both its character and its condition better than before, yet the threatened ruin is not far off.

V. 1—5. Jehoram, the son of Ahab, and brother of Ahaziah, is here on the throne of Israel; and though but a bad man, yet,

1. He removed his father's idols. He did evil in many things, but not like his father Ahab, or his mother Jezebel, v. 2. he was not so bad, so overmuch wicked, as Solomon speaks. Perhaps Jehoshaphat, though by his alliance with Ahab he made his own family worse, did something toward

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 19—25. The nature of man, in its best estate, and adorned with all the embellishments of which it is capable, resembles the unwholesome water and soil of Jericho. It is throughout infected with sin, and barren of real good; and man's best actions, till renewed by grace, proceed from selfish and carnal motives, are directed to unworthy purposes, and measured by a false rule. But when that remedy is applied, a blessed change takes place through all the powers of the soul: and repentance, faith, and love of God and man, produce good works, performed from the purest principles, and for the most important ends; and regulated according to the holy law of God, and the example of the Redeemer. In this way sometimes whole towns and cities have assumed a new appearance, through the preaching of the Gospel, and by the pouring out of the Holy Spirit; so that the curse of sin and ungodliness has been converted into the blessing of fruitfulness 'in the works of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ to the praise and glory of God:' and when this blessing is vouchsafed to seminaries of learning, and places of public education; the fertilizing streams may flow through whole countries, nay into the most distant lands, and produce the most happy change. (Notes, Ez. 47: 1—11.)—While the special favor of God evidently rests on those places where his Gospel is welcomed; his heaviest wrath will light on those who reject the gracious message, and insult and abuse his ministers.—The words and actions even of children, yea, of 'little children,' are noticed by Him. Let then the youngest who read or hear these observations, 'stand in awe, and sin not.' And if any have the misfortune to have parents or teachers so wicked, as to set them an example of such profaneness, or to instruct or encourage them to behave in such a manner; let them remember that they should 'obey God rather than man,' and that they must answer to Him for their offence, whoever commands them to commit it.—Indeed the ministers of Christ must and will, in all ordinary circumstances, continue to bless, and not curse: but the Lord is still glorious in holiness, and all creatures serve Him; and while He protects his people, even among their enraged foes, He can soon call for instruments of his vengeance on those, whom He sees to be ripe for destruction. SCOTT.

Verses 23, 24.

Several learned men have endeavored to prove, that these offenders were not children, but grown up persons: and, no doubt, the first word (neärim) rendered children, is often used in that sense. The addition, however, of the word rendered little, seems clearly to evince, that they were not men, but young boys, who had been trained up in idolatry, and taught to despise the prophets of the Lord. The children of the city in general seem to have been present; and the insult was perhaps the effect of a pre-concerted plan, to drive the sons of the prophets from Beth-el by ill treatment. The 42 children, which were devoured, seem to have been only a part of the whole company, and perhaps they were the most guilty. However, the Judge of all the earth surely did right. Had he cut them off by a fever, no one would have objected to it: but, while the dispensation would have been as severe towards them, it would not have been suited, in any adequate measure, to make the same useful impression on the minds of the survivors, or to inculcate the same important instructions to other ages and nations, as this solemn sentence and immediate execution were. reigned twelve years.

2 And he [b] wrought evil in the sight of the LORD, [c] but not like his father, and [d] like his mother; for he put away the [*] image of [e] Baal that his father had made.

3 Nevertheless [f] he cleaved unto the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, [g] which made Israel to sin; [h] he departed not therefrom.

4 ¶ And Mesha king of Moab was [i] a sheepmaster, and [k] rendered unto the king of Israel an hundred thousand lambs, and an hundred thousand rams, with the wool.

5 But it came to pass, when Ahab was dead, [l] that the king of Moab rebelled against the king of Israel.

6 And king Jehoram went out of Samaria the same time, and [m] numbered all Israel.

7 And he went and sent to Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, saying, The king of Moab hath rebelled against me: [n] wilt thou go with me against Moab to battle? And he said, I will go up; I am as thou art, my people as thy people, and my horses as thy horses.

8 And he said, Which way shall we go up? And he answered, The way through [o] the wilderness of Edom.

9 So the king of Israel went, and the king of Judah, and [p] the king of Edom; and they fetched a compass of seven days' journey: and there was [q] no water for the host, and for the cattle [†] that followed them.

10 And the king of Israel said, Alas! that [r] the LORD hath called these three kings together, to deliver them into the hand of Moab!

11 But Jehoshaphat said, [s] Is there not here a prophet of the LORD, that we may inquire of the LORD by him? And one of the king of Israel 's servants answered and said, Here is Elisha the son of Shaphat, [u] which poured water on the hands of Elijah.

making Ahab's better. Jehoram saw his father and brother cut off for worshipping Baal, and thence wisely took warning, and put away the image of Baal, resolving to worship the God of Israel only, and consult none but his prophets. So far was well, yet it did not prevent the destruction of Ahab's family, nay, that destruction came in his days, and fell immediately on him; (ch. 9: 24.) though he was one of the best of the family, for then the measure of its iniquity was full. Jehoram's reformation was next to none: (1.) He only put away the image of Baal which his father had made, and this, probably, in compliment to Jehoshaphat; he did not destroy the worship of Baal among the people, ch. 10: 19. It was well to reform his family, but he ought to have used his power to reform his kingdom. (2.) When he put away the image of Baal, he maintained the worship of the calves, that politic sin of Jeroboam, v. 3. He departed not therefrom, because that was the state engine by which the division between the two tribes was supported. Those do not truly nor acceptably repent or reform, who only part with the sins they lose by, but continue their affection to the sins they get by.

2. He did what he could, to recover his brother's losses. As he had something more of the religion of an Israelite than his father, so he had something more of the spirit of a king than his brother. Moab rebelled against Israel immediately on the death of his father, ch. 1: 1. And we do not find that Ahaziah made any attempt to chastise or reduce them, but tamely let go his interest in them rather than entertain the cares, undergo the fatigues, and run the hazards, of a war with them. His folly and pusillanimity, herein, and his indifference to the public good, were the more aggravated, because the tribute which the king of Moab paid was a very considerable branch of the revenue of the crown of Israel, v 4. The riches of kings then lay more in cattle than coin, and they thought it not below them to know the state of their flocks and herds themselves, because, as Solomon observes, the crown doth not endure to every generation. Taxes were then paid, [as in ancient Egypt,] not so much in money, as in the commodities of the country, an ease to the subject, whether an advantage to the prince or no.

V. 6—19. Jehoram has no sooner got the sceptre, than he takes the sword, to reduce Moab. Crowns bring such cares and perils. Here we have,

I. The concerting of this expedition between the king of Israel and the king of Judah, v. 6—9. 1. Jehoram courts Jehoshaphat to be his confederate, gains him, v. 7. Judah and Israel, though unhappily divided, yet can unite against Moab, a common enemy. Those are no friends to their own peace and strength, who can never find in their hearts to forgive and forget an old injury, and unite with those that have formerly broken in on their rights.—2. Jehoshaphat advised, that they should not march against Moab the nearest way, over Jordan, but round through the wilderness of Edom, that they might take the king of Edom, a tributary, and his forces, along with them.

II. The great straits the confederate army was reduced to. Before they saw the face of an enemy, they were all in danger of perishing for want of water, v. 9. God suffers his people, by their own improvidence, to bring themselves into distress, that the wisdom, power, and goodness, of his providence may be glorified in their relief. The king of Israel sadly laments the distress, v. 10. It was he that had called these kings together, yet he charges it on Providence, and reflects on that as unkind. Thus the foolishness of man perverteth his way, and then his heart fretteth against the Lord.

III. Jehoshaphat's good motion to ask counsel of God in this exigence, v. 11. They could not but be reminded of the wonders their fathers told them of, the waters fetched out of the rock. This thought, we may suppose, encouraged Jehoshaphat's motion. He was the more concerned, because it was by his advice they fetched this compass through the wilderness, v. 8. It had been much better, had he inquired of the Lord before he engaged in this war, or steered this course; so the distress might have been prevented. Good men are sometimes remiss and forgetful, and neglect their duty, till necessity and affliction drive them to it.

IV. Elisha recommended as a proper person to consult, v. 11. It is strange, 1. That Elisha should follow the camp, unasked, unobserved, and in no post of honor at all. We may suppose it was by special direction from heaven. It would often be bad with us, if God did not take more care of us, both for soul and body, than we for ourselves. 2. That a servant of the king of Israel knew of his being there, when the king himself did not. Probably, it was such a servant as Obadiah was to his father Ahab, one that feared the Lord; to such a one Elisha made himself known, not to the kings.

V. The application the kings made to Elisha, v. 12. Jehoshaphat had such esteem for a prophet with whom the word of the Lord was, that he would condescend to visit him in his own person, and not send. The other two were moved by the straits they were in, to make their court to the prophet. He that humbled himself, was thus exalted, when three kings came to beg his assistance; see Rev. 3: 9.

VI. The entertainment Elisha gave them. 1. He was very plain with the wicked king of Israel, v. 13. 'How canst thou expect an answer of peace from me?' Elisha was not imposed on, as Jehoshaphat was, by his partial and hypocritical reformation; he knew, that, though he had put away the image of Baal, Baal's prophets were still dear to him, and some of them perhaps now in his camp. Go, said he, Get you to the gods ye have served. Elisha tells him to his face, in a holy indignation at his wickedness, that he could scarcely find in his heart to look toward him, or to see him, v. 14. Jehoram is to be respected as a prince, but as a wicked man, he is vile, and to be contemned, Ps. 15: 4. Elisha, as a subject, will honor him, but, as a prophet, will make him know his iniquity. For them that had such an extraordinary commission, it was fit (though not for a common person) to say to a king, Thou art wicked, Job 34: 18. Jehoram has so much self-command as to take it patiently; he cares not now for hearing of the prophets of Baal, but is a humble suitor to the God of Israel and his prophet, representing 12 And Jehoshaphat said, [x] The word of the LORD is with him. So [y] the king of Israel and Jehoshaphat and the king of Edom went down to meet him.

[Practical Observations.]

13 And Elisha said unto the king of Israel, [z] What have I to do with thee? [a] get thee to [b] the prophets of thy father, and to the prophets of thy mother. And the king of Israel said unto him, [c] Nay; for the LORD hath called these three kings together, to deliver them into the hand of Moab.

14 And Elisha said, [d] As the LORD of hosts liveth, before whom I stand, surely, were it not that [e] I regard the presence of Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, [f] I would not look toward thee, nor see thee.

15 But now [g] bring me a minstrel. And it came to pass, when the minstrel played, that [h] the hand of the LORD came upon him.

16 And he said, Thus saith the LORD, [i] Make this valley full of ditches:

17 For thus saith the LORD, [k] Ye shall not see wind, neither shall ye see rain; yet that valley shall be filled with water, [l] that ye may drink, both ye, and your cattle, and your beasts.

18 And [m] this is but a light thing in the sight of the LORD: [n] he will deliver the Moabites also into your hand.

19 And [p] ye shall smite every fenced city, and every choice city, and shall [q] fell every good tree, and stop all wells of water, and * mar every good piece of land with stones.

20 And it came to pass in the morning, [r] when the meat-offering was offered, that, behold, there came water by the way of Edom, and the country was filled with water.

21 And when all the Moabites heard that the kings were come up to fight against them, they gathered all that were able to put on armor, and upward, and stood in the border.

22 And they rose up early in the morning, and the sun shone upon the water, and the Moabites saw the water on the other side as red as blood:

23 And they said, This is blood: the kings are surely slain, and they have smitten one another: now therefore, Moab, to the spoil.

24 And when they came to the camp of Israel, the Israelites rose up and smote the Moabites, so that they fled before them: but they went forward smiting them, even in their country.

25 And they beat down the cities, and on every good piece of land cast every man his stone, and filled it; and they stopped all the wells of water, and felled all the good trees: only in Kirharaseth left they the stones thereof; however the slingers went about it, and smote it.

26 And when the king of Moab saw that the battle was too sore for him, he took with him seven hundred men that drew swords, to break through even unto the king of Edom: but they could not.

27 Then he took his eldest son that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall. And there was great indignation against Israel: and they departed from him, and returned to their own land.

V. 20—27. We have here the divine gift of both the things God had promised by Elisha; water and victory; and the former not only a pledge of the latter, but a mean of it.

I. It relieved their armies, which were ready to perish, v. 20. and, which was very observable, just at the time of the offering of the morning sacrifice on the altar at Jerusalem, a certain time, and universally known; that time Elisha chose for his hour of prayer, in token of his communion with the temple-service, and his expectation of success, by virtue of the great Sacrifice. That time God chose for the hour of mercy, to put an honor on the daily sacrifice which had been despised. God answered Daniel's prayer just at the time of the evening-sacrifice, (Dan. 9: 21.) for He will glorify his own institutions.

II. It deceived their enemies, who were ready to triumph, into their destruction. Notice is brought the Moabites of the advances of the confederate army; to oppose which, all that were able to put on armor were raised, and posted on the frontiers, where they are ready to give them a warm reception, (v. 21.) promising themselves, it would be easy dealing with an army fatigued by so long a march through the wilderness of Edom. But see here,

1. How easily they were drawn into their own delusions; observe the steps of their self-deceit. They saw the water in the valley where Israel encamped, and conceited it was blood, v. 22. They knew it was a dry valley, and (there having been no rain) could not imagine it should be water. The sun shone on it, and, probably, the sky was red and lowering, a presage of foul weather that day, (Matt. 16: 3.) and so it proved to them. But this making the water look red,* their own fancies, which made them willing to believe what made for them, suggested, This is blood; God permitting them thus to impose on themselves. If their camp was thus full of blood, they conclude, 'Certainly the kings have fallen out, and they have slain one another, v. 23. what else should slay them?' And, 'If so, we have nothing to do but to divide the prey. Now therefore, Moab, to the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Partial reformations often originate from the hope of advantage in temporal things, by the favor of godly men: and even the selfish will sometimes renounce those sins, which occasion them loss and trouble; and then detect their own hypocrisy by adhering to those which promise present advantage.—Worldly men are quick-sighted to their temporal interests, but they seek nothing further; and often seduce pious persons to forget their own principles, and to 'lean to their own understandings,' instead of 'acknowledging the LORD in all their ways.' But whilst the wicked in their difficulties are ready to 'fret against the Lord,' as the author of those calamities, which their own sin and folly have brought upon them; the believer will be humbled before Him for neglect of duties, and disposed to inquire his will and seek his help. And when corrections have brought men to this temper, relief will be afforded them; and their ungodly connections will often succeed the better on their account.—Those, who would be eminent in the church of the living God, must readily stoop to the meanest service and the hardest labor: for such as have thus distinguished themselves, have generally attained to singular honor and usefulness. (Matt. 20: 24—28.) SCOTT.

Verses 13, 14.

It is probable, Elisha meant to show Jehoshaphat the deficiency and hypocrisy of Jehoram's reformation; as his heart still went after the prophets and worship of Baal: and he had no real regard for the prophets of God, [nor would have given Him the glory of success,] though in his distress he consults Elisha.—Doubtless the prophet was directed to act in his public character, differently from what he would have done as a private subject of Jehoram's kingdom. This indeed is implied in the words of the oath, by which he confirmed what he spake. 'As the LORD of hosts liveth, before whom I stand.' (M. R. d.) SCOTT.

Verse 15.

This music was intended to calm the prophet's mind, and so prepare him for illapses of the Holy Spirit. ID.

'To be able to discern the voice of God, and the operations of his hand, it is necessary that the mind be calm, and the passions [affective faculties] all in harmony, under the direction of reason; that reason may be under the influence of the divine Spirit.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 16, 17.

It is useless to inquire whence this water came [note, 2:11, 12.]: He, that caused the rock to pour forth rivers, could never want resources. (Ex. 17:5, 6.) The supply, however, was evidently miraculous: and those who have insinuated the contrary, as if Elisha had merely known that there was water in the place, if they would only dig for it; must suppose that the prophet, whom they attempt to disparage, had more sagacity in matters of this kind, than these three kings, with all their officers, and counsellors, and soldiers. SCOTT.

Verses 18, 19.

(M. R.) Providence put it in Jehoram's power to execute that severe vengeance on the revolted Moabites, which he meditated. But it is not certain, whether the words of Elisha implied a permission to do so, or were merely prophetical of the event. (Deut. 20:19, 20.) ID.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13—27. Many show respect to the ministers of God under heavy trials, who despise them at other times. In that case, they might be justly left to seek help from the worldly idols, the vicious companions, the worthless forms, or infidel principles, which they have preferred to the favor and truth of God: and they should be shown, that with Him 'there is no respect of persons.' The minister may also properly let them know, that he is no stranger to their character, and will pay no court to them, whatever he would do or suffer for their good: and he, who in private life is the allowed inferior, and willing to be the servant of all, when speaking in the name of the Lord, is commissioned to 'rebuke with all authority.' In all ordinary cases, however, it should be with evident affection and respect; and it is proper so to change the voice, and regulate the conduct, as decisively to mark the difference between the offending believer and the mere hypocrite.—The Lord will take occasion, from the distresses of his offending servants, to manifest the glory of his power, truth, and love: and, whilst all good gifts are from Him alone, we must show our believing expectation, and prepare for their reception, by observing the directions of his Word.—Our rule is, to do good and not evil to our adversaries: but we shall hereafter behold and rejoice in the destruction of all the enemies of God. And they who are expressly commissioned by Him, (as the Israelites of old, and magistrates at present,) to execute his vengeance on the wicked, are authorized in those severities, which in others would be extremely criminal.—The Lord will put honor on his own institutions: and sinners left to themselves are speedily infatuated; for if men could not believe what they wish to be true, without proof, and in defiance of demonstration, 'the fool' would not 'say in his heart, there is no God.'—We should be careful not to urge the worst of men to extremities, lest we should occasion blasphemies, murder, or suicide: we ought rather to recede from our right, and leave them to the judgment of God. SCOTT.

civil establishment, the people could not exactly observe the ritual law. The prophets were therefore directed, by God Himself, to accommodate their conduct to these circumstances, and to spend their lives in recovering or preserving the people from idolatry, and in teaching them the grand essentials of acceptable religion.—In every age hitherto, considerate and faithful ministers have found it impracticable for them, to rectify every external deviation from what to them appeared most scriptural: but, having adverted to the distinction between what is desirable, and what is attainable; and between the essentials of true religion in every age, and matters more circumstantial; they have accommodated themselves to that state of things which they could not alter; and endeavored to bring men to repentance, faith in Christ, and holiness of life, and to as scriptural an external worship as they could. And, though some of their brethren have censured them, the Lord God of Elijah and Elisha has evidently pleaded their cause, by making them the instruments of numerous conversions, and great revivals of religion: whilst others, scrupulously exact in external forms, and earnest to magnify them, have worn out their lives in vainly attempting to new model the church and the world, and have missed their opportunity of more essential usefulness. (4:23. 1 Sam. 7:9, 17. 1 K. 18:4, 36, 37.) In due time the Lord will regulate every thing externally, as well as internally, in the best manner: in the meanwhile we must make the best of things: we must aim to be satisfied respecting our own conduct as in the sight of God; to be moderate and candid in our own judgment concerning those who differ from us, and patient under their censures of us; and, learning what that means, 'I will have mercy and not sacrifice,' to be careful not to lose sight of the great end of all religion, for the sake of some of the disputable means of attaining it. For at last, nothing 'availeth in Christ Jesus, but faith which worketh by love,' and 'a new creature' manifested in 'newness of life.' (Gal. 5:1—6. 6:11—16.)

The way of Edom.] Mt. Seir was inhabited by Edom: and some think, that plentiful rains on the mountains of Edom supplied the water. But this is uncertain; and Mt. Seir was not so distant, but that tokens of wind or rain would have been perceived by the army. SCOTT.

Verse 27.

It has been supposed, that the king of Moab offered in sacrifice the eldest son of the king of Edom, whom he had taken prisoner: but the narrative does not admit of this interpretation. It has been thought, that a tradition of Abraham's offering Isaac, nay, that even a distorted tradition concerning the sacrifice of the Redeemer, gave occasion to those horrid human sacrifices, which have been, and still are, very common in the Gentile world. But this at most could only be the occasion: the cause was two-fold; the depravity and blindness of the human heart, and the subtlety and malignity of Satan; in whose worship, as directed by him, it must be a first principle, that the more costly, painful, unnatural, and cruel the oblation is, the more acceptable the sacrifice; because it best gratifies his pride, envy, and malice. (Lev. 20:2—5. Mic. 6:6—8.) SCOTT. To this it may be added, that a religion of fear, merely, will but excite its neighbor propensities to cruelty, and murder, as is often seen in the persecuting bigot, whose conscience is uneducated, while his zeal and devotion fire a bad heart with exterminating rage, whose effects he will think an acceptable offering to the God he has set up. Such ever has been and such still is the religion of the lower propensities. ED.

CHAP. IV.

A Elisha's word the oil of a poor prophet's widow is increased, to enable her to pay her debt, 1—7. He is hospitably entertained by a woman of Shunem, who is rewarded by having a son in her old age, 8—17. The child dies, but is restored to life in answer to Elisha's prayer, 18—37. Elisha heals the pottage made with poisonous herbs, 38—41; and feeds a hundred men with twenty small barley loaves, 42—44.

NOW there cried a certain woman of the wives of the [a] sons of the prophets unto Elisha, saying, Thy servant my husband is dead; and thou knowest that [b] thy servant did fear the LORD: and [c] the creditor is come to take unto him my two sons to be bondmen.

2 And Elisha said unto her, [d] What shall I do for thee? tell me: what hast thou in the house? And she said, Thine handmaid hath not any thing in the house [e] save a pot of oil.

3 Then he said, Go, borrow thee vessels abroad of all thy neighbors, even [f] empty vessels; [*] borrow not a few.

4 And when thou art come in, [g] thou shalt shut the door upon thee and upon thy sons, [h] and shalt pour out into all those vessels, and thou shalt set aside that which is full.

5 So [i] she went from him, and shut the door upon her and upon her sons, who brought the vessels to her, and she poured out.

CHAP. IV. Great service Elisha had done, in the foregoing ch. for the three kings; to his prayers and prophecies they owed their lives and triumphs. One would have expected the next ch. should have told us what honors and what dignities were conferred on Elisha for this: that he should immediately have been preferred at court, and made prime-minister of state; that Jehoshaphat should have taken him home with him, and advanced him in his kingdom. No, the wise man delivered the army, but no man remembered the wise man, Eccl. 9: 15. Or, if he had preferment offered him, he declined it; he preferred the honor of doing good in the schools of the prophets before that of being great in the courts of princes. God magnified him, and that sufficed him; magnified him indeed, for we have him here employed in no less than five miracles.

V. 1—7. Elisha's miracles were for use, not show: Christ's were so; not only great wonders, but great favors. God magnifies his goodness with his power. So here,

I. Elisha readily receives a poor widow's complaint: to whom should a prophet's widow apply herself, but to a father to the sons of the prophets, who concerned himself in the welfare of their families? Marriage is honorable in all, and not inconsistent with the most sacred professions. It seems her husband was well known to Elisha. Ministers of eminent gifts and stations should make themselves familiar with their inferiors, and know their character and state. He had also the reputation of a godly man. Elisha knew him to be such, one that had kept his integrity in a time of general apostasy; one of the 7000 that had not bowed the knee to Baal. He died poor, and in debt more than he was worth; not from prodigality, luxury, and riotous living; religion obliges men not to live above what they have, nor spend more than God gives them, no not in expenses otherwise lawful; for thereby, of necessity, they must disable themselves, at last, to give every one his own, and so prove guilty of a continued act of injustice: yet it may be the lot of those that fear God, to be in debt, and insolvent, through afflictive providences, bad debts, or their own imprudence; the children of light are not always wise for this world. Perhaps this prophet was impoverished by persecution: when Jezebel ruled, prophets had much ado to live, especially if they had families. The creditors were very severe to her. Two sons she had, and their labor is reckoned assets in her hand; that must go therefore, and they be bondmen seven years, (Ex. 21: 2.) to work out this debt. Those that leave their families under a load of debt disproportionable to their estates, know not what trouble they entail; but the generation of the upright may expect help from God's providence, and countenance from his prophets.

II. He effectually relieves her, and puts her in a way both to pay her debt, and to maintain herself and her family. This was done by miracle, but indicates the best method of charity, and the greatest kindness one can do to poor people, which is, if possible, to help them into a way of improving what little they have, by their own industry and ingenuity.

1. He directed her what to do. The sons of the prophets were poor, and it would signify little to make a collection for her among them. He therefore inquires what she had to make money of, v. 2. had she had any plate or furniture, he would have bidden her part with it. We cannot reckon that really, nor comfortably, our own, which is not so when all our debts are paid. If she had not had this pot of oil, the divine power could have supplied her; but having this, it will work on this, and so teach us to make the best of what we have. Her borrowing empty vessels, (v. 3.) may indicate her poverty and her credit; and she must shut the door, to prevent interruptions from the creditors and others, that she might not seem proudly to boast of this miraculous supply, and might have opportunity for prayer and praise to God. [Note, Matt. 6:6.] Observe, The oil was to be multiplied in the pouring, as the other widow's meal in the spending. The way to increase what we have, is, to use it; to him that so hath, shall be given. It is not hoarding the talents, but trading with them, that doubles them. It must be poured out by herself, not by Elisha, or some of the sons of the prophets, to intimate that it is after our careful and diligent endeavors, that we may expect the blessing of God to enrich us, both for this world and the other. What we have, will increase best in our own hand.

2. She did it accordingly, and had the result, v. 6. She sees not the spring that supplies it, but believes it to be in Him in whom all our springs are.

3. The oil continued flowing as long as she had any empty vessels to receive it; and then stayed, v. 6. Note, We are never straitened in God, in his power and bounty, and the riches of his grace; all our straitness is in ourselves. It is our faith that fails, not his promise. He gives above what we ask: were there more vessels, there is enough in God to fill them; enough for all, enough for each. Was this pot of oil exhausted, as long as there were any vessels to be filled from it? And shall we fear lest the golden oil, which flows from the very root and fatness of the good olive, should fail, as long as there are any lamps to be supplied from it? Zech. 4: 12.

4. She must not keep the oil for her own use, v. 7. Those whom Providence has made poor, must be content with poor accommodations for themselves—that is knowing how to want; and must not think, when they get a little of that which is better than ordinary, to feed their own luxury

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. The prophets seem in general to have married and brought up families; though Elijah and Elisha are supposed to have continued in a single state.—Except the prophets had private fortunes, which probably was not often the case, their incomes must have been very precarious; and would arise either from the donations of pious persons, or from their own manual labor. The people perhaps sometimes gave them the first fruits, and some other of the oblations, which would have belonged to the priests and Levites, if they had not departed from among them. (2 Chr. 11:13—17.) Many of them, however, seem to have been very scantily provided for.

To be bondmen.] Those who defend slavery from the Mosaic law, and from its universality, must also defend this. ED. 'The Romans, Athenians, and Asiatics in general had the same authority over their children as the Hebrews had. Romulus gave the Romans power to cast them into prison, beat, employ them as slaves in agriculture, sell them for slaves, or even take away their lives! Dion. Halicarnas. Numa Pompilius enacted, that if a son married with his father's consent, his father could not sell him for debt. Diocletian and Maximian forbade freemen to be sold for debt. The ancient Athenians had the same right over their children as the Romans; but Solon reformed this barbarous custom. So the people of Asia, and Lucullus tried to check it by moderating the laws respecting usury. The Georgians may alienate their children, and creditors may sell their debtors' wives and children. And we have reason to believe that this custom long prevailed in the British isles. In short, this custom appears to have been the custom of all the earth. We have some remains of it yet in the senseless and pernicious custom of throwing a man into prison for debt, though his own industry and labor be absolutely necessary to discharge it; and these cannot be exercised within the loathsome and contagious walls of a prison.'

[Practical Observations.]

8 ¶ And † it fell on a day, that Elisha passed to [m] Shunem, where was [n] a great woman: and [o] she ‡ constrained him to eat bread. And so it was, that as oft as he passed by he turned in thither to eat bread.

9 And [p] she said unto her husband, Behold now, I perceive that [q] this is a holy [r] man of God, which passeth by us continually.

10 [s] Let us make [t] a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall; and let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick: and it shall be, when he cometh to us, that he shall turn in thither.

11 And it fell on a day that he came thither, and he turned into the chamber, and lay there.

12 And he said to [u] Gehazi his [v] servant, Call this Shunammite. And when he had called her, she stood before him.

She must sell it. We may suppose, being produced by miracle, it was the best of its kind; (like the wine, John 2: 10.) so she might have both a good price, and a quick market. Probably, the merchants bought it to export; oil was a commodity Israel traded in, Ezek. 27: 17. She must pay her debt with the money she received. Her creditors were too rigorous, yet they must not therefore lose their debt. Her first care must be to discharge that, even before she makes any provision for her children. It is a fundamental law of our religion, that we pay every just debt, though we leave ever so little for ourselves; and this, not of constraint, but willingly and without grudging; not only for wrath, to avoid being sued, but also for conscience-sake. They that are honest, cannot eat their daily bread with pleasure, unless it be their own. The rest must not be laid up, but she and her children must live on it, and with it put themselves into a capacity of getting an honest livelihood. Hence, [1.] Let those that are poor and in distress, be encouraged to trust God for supply, in the way of duty. It is true, we cannot now expect miracles, yet we may expect mercies, if we wait on God, and seek to Him. Let widows particularly, and prophets' widows in a special manner, depend on Him to preserve them and their fatherless children alive, for to them He will be a Husband, a Father. Let those whom God has blessed with plenty, use it for the glory of God, and under the direction of his Word: let them do justly with it, as the widow did, and serve God cheerfully in the use of it; and, as Elisha, be ready to do good to those that need them, be eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame.

V. 8—17. Observe here,

I. The kindness of the Shunammite woman to Elisha. Shunem was a city in the tribe of Issachar, on the road between Samaria and Carmel, a road Elisha often travelled, as we find ch. 2: 25. and being so famous, he could not pass or repass unobserved. This pious matron, having notice of his being there, constrained him to dine with her, v. 8. He was modest, loath to be troublesome, and affected not to associate with those of the first rank; so it was not without some difficulty, he was first drawn into an acquaintance there: but afterward, whenever he came that way in his circuit, he constantly called. So well pleased was she with her guest, and so desirous of his company, that she will not only welcome him to her table, but provide a lodging room for him, that he may make the longer stay, not doubting but her house would be blessed for his sake, and all under her roof edified by his pious instructions and example; a good design, yet she will neither lay out her husband's money, nor invite strangers to his house, without his consent asked and obtained, v. 9, 10. She suggests, the stranger was a holy man of God, who therefore would do good to their family, and God would recompense the kindness done him. The kindness she intended, would also be no great charge; she would build him only a little chamber; the furniture should be very plain, a bed, table, stool, and candlestick; all that was needful only for his convenience, his repose, study, reading and writing. Elisha seems highly pleased with these accommodations; he turned in and lay there, (v. 11.) and, as it should seem, his man in the same chamber, for he was far from taking state.

II. Elisha's gratitude for this kindness; they that receive courtesies, should study to return them; it ill becomes men of God to be ungrateful, or to sponge on those that are generous.

1. He offers to use his interest for her in the king's court, v. 13. thus he magnifies the kindness he received, as the humble are accustomed to do. As the liberal devises liberal things, so the grateful devises grateful things. 'Wouldest thou be spoken for to the king, or the captain of the host, for an office for thine husband, civil or military? Hast thou any complaint, petition, suit, any thing that needs the countenance of the higher powers? Wherein can I serve thee?' It seems, Elisha had got such an interest by his late services, that though he chose not to prefer himself, he could prefer his friends; a good man can take as much pleasure in serving others, as in raising himself. But she needs not any good offices of this kind, I dwell (says she) among mine own people, that is, 'We are well off as we are, and do not aim at preferment.' Some years after this, we find this Shunammite had occasion to be spoken for to the king, though now she needed it not, ch. 8: 3, 4. Those that dwell among their own people, must not think their mountain stands so strong as that it cannot be moved; our continuing city is above.

2. He used his interest for her in the court of heaven, which was far better. Elisha consulted with his servant what kindness he should do for her, such a freedom did this great prophet admit

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. It is incumbent on all Christians, and especially on ministers, to submit to Providence in respect of their temporal provision; and, while they trust in God for their daily bread, not to tempt Him by negligence or extravagance. We should be careful to perform our present duty, and to commit all our concerns to the Lord: we should study to adorn the Gospel in our life and conversation, and He will take care of us and ours: and if He bring us into distress, He will manifest his power and truth in our deliverance. He generally supplies what is requisite for honesty and charity to his people, by blessing them while they are occupying with a little.—In every way we should show a readiness to relieve those in distress; and to give them our counsel and prayers, when we have nothing else.—At length all the vessels of mercy shall be filled with the Lord's goodness: and the Redeemer's all-sufficiency will only be stayed from supplying the wants and saving the souls of sinners, when there are no more inclined to come to Him for salvation. Elisha seems to have generally resided at or near mt. Carmel: but he went his circuits through the land, to visit the seminaries of the prophets, and to instruct the people, which probably was his stated employment, when not sent on some special service. (2:1. 1 K. 19: 20, 21.)—The husband of this woman seems to have been a pious person, but not so zealous and active as she: and, as he confided his domestic affairs to her care, she is chiefly noticed. By his approbation she prepared for the prophet a retired lodging; perhaps perceiving that the hurry of a large family did not suit his contemplative mind.—The plain, simple manner in which the prophet's chamber was furnished, (though he was the patriarch, if I may so speak, of the whole church of Israel,) is worthy of our notice. ID.

It seems rather to have been a little apartment, built expressly for the prophet, on the roof of the house, by carrying up the wall. So the Vulg. &c. transl. cœnaculum; or perhaps the most natural impression from the v. is, that it was a chamber built against the wall, in a part of the court, retired, but convenient to the entrance. But comp. note, 1:2. ED.

'To most of the (modern) eastern houses there is a smaller one annexed, which sometimes rises one story higher than the house; at other times it consists of one or two rooms only, and a terrace; whilst others that are built (as they frequently are) over the porch or gateway, have, if we except the ground floor, (which they have not) all the conveniences that belong to the house, properly so called. There is a door of communication from them into the gallery of the house, kept open or shut at the discretion of the master of the family; besides another door, which opens immediately from a privy-stairs (Luke 24:17.) down into the porch or street, without giving the least disturbance to the house. These rear-houses are called Alee, or Oleah, (the house proper is called Dar, or Beet,) and in them strangers are entertained, &c. and men retire for meditation or diversions. The Oleah of Scripture [the Heb. here is alyyath-kir, a wall-Oleah,] being the same, is rendered by the same word in the Arab version.' SHAW.

even his servant to; and Gehazi tells him of her only grievance. Those are the most welcome kindnesses, which are most suited to our necessities. He sent for her immediately; she very humbly and respectfully stood in the door, (v. 15.) according to her accustomed modesty, and then he assured her that within a year she should bring forth a son, v. 16. The promise was a surprise, and she begs she may not be flattered by it; 'Nay, my lord, thou art a man of God, and therefore, I hope, speakest seriously, and dost not jest with me, nor lie.' The event, within the time limited, confirmed the truth of the promise, v. 17. We may well imagine what joy this brought to the family; Sing, O barren.

V. 18—37. I. The sudden death of the child, though so much a darling; he is so far past the perils of infancy, that he is able to go to the field to his father, who, no doubt, is pleased with his engaging talk, and his joy of his son is greater than the joy of his harvest; but either the cold or the heat of the open field overcame the child, that was bred tenderly, and he complains to his father that his head aches, v. 19. Whither should we go with our complaints, but to our Heavenly Father? Thither the Spirit of adoption brings believers with all their grievances, all their desires. The father sends him to his mother's arms, little suspecting any danger in his indisposition, but hoping he will drop asleep and awake well; but it proves fatal, he sleeps the sleep of death; (v. 20.) well in the morning, and dead by noon; all the mother's care and tenderness cannot keep him alive: a child of promise, a child of prayer, and given in love, yet taken away. But how admirably does the prudent, pious mother guard her lips, under this surprising affliction! Not one peevish, unbecoming word escapes her; like a genuine daughter of Abraham's faith, as well as Ioins, she accounts that God is able to raise him from the dead, for thence she received him in a figure, Heb. 11: 19. She had heard of the raising of the widow's son of Sarepta, and that the spirit of Elijah rested on Elisha; and confided in God's goodness; by this faith, women received their dead raised to life, Heb. 11: 35. In this faith, she makes no preparation for the burial of her dead child, but for its resurrection; for she lays him on the prophet's bed, (v. 21.) expecting he would stand her friend; O woman, great is thy faith! He that wrought it, would not frustrate it.

II. Her application to the prophet, who, as it happened very opportunely, was now at the college on mt. Carmel, not far off.

1. She begged leave of her husband to go to the prophet, yet not acquainting him with her errand, lest he should not have faith enough to let her go, v. 22. He objected, (v. 23.) but in a manner which intimated her usual attendance on public worship at the times appointed; 'Why wilt thou go to-day? What is the matter?' 'No harm,' said she; 'it shall be well, so you will say yourself, hereafter.' See how this husband and wife vied with each other, in showing mutual regard; she was so dutiful to him, that she would not go till she had acquainted him with her journey, and he so kind to her, [and confident of her good sense,] that he would not oppose it, though she did not think fit to acquaint him with her business.

2. Gehazi was not the man she came to complain to, therefore she puts him off with, 'It is well': she said little, but what she did say, was very patient; 'It is well with me, with my husband, with the child'—all well, and yet the child dead in the house. Note, When God calls away our dearest relations by death, it becomes us quietly to say, 'It is well both with us and them;' it is well, for all is well that God does; all is well with them, if gone to heaven; all well with us, if by the affliction we are furthered in our way thither.

3. When her passion would do her service, she knew how to discover it, (v. 27.) as well as how to conceal it, when it would do her disservice. Gehazi knew his master would not be pleased to see her lie at his feet, and therefore would have raised her up; but Elisha waited to hear from her, since he might not know immediately from God, the cause of her trouble. God discovered things to his prophets, as He saw fit, not always as they desired; God did not show this to the prophet, because he might know it from the woman. What she said, was very pathetic; she appeals to the prophet, (1.) On her indifference to this mercy; 'Did I desire a son of my lord? No, thou knowest I did not; it was thine own proposal, not mine; I did not fret for the want of a son, as Hannah, nor beg, as Rachel, Give me children, or else I die.' Note, When any creature-comfort is taken from us, it is well, if we can say, through grace, that we did not set our hearts inordinately upon it; for if we did, we have reason to fear it was given in anger, and taken away in wrath. (2.) On her entire dependence on the prophet's word; Did I not say, Do not deceive me? This reflection on it may be considered either, [1.] As quarrelling with the prophet for deceiving her; she was ready to think herself mocked the mercy, was so soon removed: better never have had the child, than be deprived of him, just as he begins to be a comfort. Note, The loss of a mercy should not make us undervalue the gift of it; or, [2.] As pleading with the prophet to raise the child to life again; I said, Do not deceive me, and I know thou wilt not. Note, However the providence of God may disappoint us, we may be sure his promise never did, nor ever will, deceive us: hope in that will not make us ashamed.

Gehazi, as having more leisure and opportunity to observe the affairs of the family than Elisha had, discovered what favor would be most acceptable; and he seems not to have doubted the prevalence of his master's prayers in this respect. It is common in those countries, where time and labor are not so much valued as with us, for the owner of a hired ass or mule, or one employed by the owner, to follow the jaded animal and his rider, with a club, on foot: sometimes running behind for 25 miles per day. So on the monuments of Egypt, as well as along the shores of the Mediterranean, laden asses, without bridles, are driven with a stick before their master. ED.

(23.) It appears, that on the sabbaths, new moons, and other solemnities, the people were accustomed to assemble in appointed places, to worship God, and to receive instruction from the prophets; and it was thought allowable to use the cattle on the sabbath-day, to go to the prophet, or to these places, if at a distance. (Ex. 20:8—11.)—It is not certain whether they assembled in synagogues, or private houses; but probably it was done in most parts of the land of Israel.—In Judah, pious people had the advantage of the temple-worship, and the instructions of the priests and Levites; they were generally countenanced and protected by their kings; and they thankfully availed themselves of these advantages. But in Israel, the ruling powers were against them: yet they served God according to their consciences, as their circumstances would admit. (3:20.) SCOTT.

30 And the mother of the child said, [g] As the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth, [h] I will not leave thee. And he arose, and followed her.

31 And Gehazi passed on before them and laid the staff upon the face of the child; but there was [i] neither voice nor § hearing: wherefore he went again to meet him, and told him, saying, The child is [k] not awaked.

32 And when Elisha was come into the house, behold [l] the child was dead, and laid upon his bed.

35 Then he returned, and walked in the house ‖ to and fro, and went up, and stretched himself upon him: and the child sneezed seven times, [p] and the child opened his eyes.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8—37. The ministers of religion should not seek great things for themselves, or court the intimacy of the great, except to do good to them, or by them.—Alas! all earthly comforts are sources of trouble and sorrow: anxious fears counterbalance our pleasure from our beloved children, when most hopeful: and their sudden sickness and death may turn all our joy into poignant anguish. On such occasions it is right to keep silence, or to say that 'all is well:' nor must we think it hard to bring up children for the grave, or for the kingdom of heaven.—In all our troubles we may find peace and comfort, from the counsel and prayers of the Lord's faithful servants, who can teach us how to turn all our losses into the richest gain. Their company therefore, with the ordinances of God, and the throne of grace, should be doubly welcome to the afflicted and bereaved.—The gospel of salvation will no more effect the sinner's conversion, without the presence and blessing of God, than the condemning law will: and if the minister be a hypocrite, and destitute of faith, little good can be expected from the most exact external observances; 'the sinners are "not awaked"' will generally be the doleful report. Not so, when the use of appointed means is accompanied by the spirit of fervent, believing prayer, and persevering expectation from the Lord.—As the choicest comforts occasion the severest trials, so our heaviest afflictions make way for the sweetest consolations.—It is happy and comely when harmony prevails in domestic life; when the husband's authority is tempered with affection and unsuspecting confidence; when the wife answers that confidence with deference and submission, as well as fidelity; and when each party consults the other's inclinations, and both unite in attendance on the ordinances of God, and supporting his cause.

Verses 24—26.

Mt. Carmel was at some distance from Shunem; and the words, 'Slack not thy riding,' imply, that the servant also rode on an ass. The word, rendered Drive, properly means, Lead the way, or, Go before.—Elisha did not expect to see her at this time; and, being afraid that some calamity had befallen her, sent Gehazi to make very particular inquiries; to which she answered, 'It is well,' or peace. (Shalom.) Some suppose she only meant to put off Gehazi with this answer, as in part true, in respect of herself and her husband, though not the whole of the case: but it is probable it was also the language of her faith and submission; as she was persuaded, the affliction was in mercy, and would terminate well, though her passions conflicted against her better judgment. (M. R.—Note, Lev. 10:3.) SCOTT. Or, it was but a common answer of compliment merely, to a common question, and meant no more than the modern, 'I thank you,' of equivocal meaning. The more bigoted Turks, on meeting a Christian, will give him the 'salam,' which means any thing or nothing, while they conceive it a religious duty to withhold other expressions of compliment, (abundant in their language, and used to tediousness on meeting, v. 29. and note, Luke 10:4.) which they think a Mohammedan only deserves. ED.

Verse 27.

(M. R.) It is plain from this verse, that the prophets derived all their supernatural knowledge from immediate communication; and not from any power of discerning, habitually inherent in them. SCOTT.

Verses 29—31.

It is difficult to determine what the prophet meant, by thus sending Gehazi. He, however, was ordered to proceed as a man on urgent business, who may not be delayed even by attention to ordinary civilities: (Luke 10:4.) and he would thus arrive at Shunem some time before Elisha could. Some think the prophet altered his purpose, at the importunity of the woman, and so did not pray for Gehazi's success. (5:20—27.) SCOTT.

Verses 33—35.

It is instructive to compare the manner, in which Elijah and Elisha wrought their miracles, especially in raising the dead, with that of Jesus Christ. Every part of their conduct expressed a consciousness of inability in themselves, and an entire dependence on another, and earnest application to Him for his interposition: but Jesus wrought by his own power; 'He spake, and it was done:' 'Young man, I say unto thee, arise;' 'Talitha, cumi;' 'Lazarus, come forth.' (Notes, 1 Kings 17:21, 22. Heb. 11:35—38.) The joyful mother not only expressed her high respect for the prophet, but worshipped God also, giving Him humble thanks for his great goodness to her: for the words may be rendered, 'She fell at his feet, and worshipped.' SCOTT.

38 ¶ And Elisha [t]came again to Gilgal; and there was [u]a dearth in the land, and [x]the sons of the prophets [y]were sitting before him: and he said unto his servant, [z]Set on the great pot, and seethe pottage for the sons of the prophets.

39 And one went out into the field to gather herbs, and found [a]a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds his lap full, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage: for they knew them not.

40 So they poured out for the men to eat: and it came to pass, as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out and said, [b]O thou man of God, there is [c]death in the pot! and they could not eat thereof.

41 But he said, Then bring meal: [d]and he cast it into the pot; and he said, Pour out for the people, that they may eat: and [e]there was no [*]harm in the pot.

42 ¶ And there came a man from [f]Baal-shalisha, and brought the man of God [g]bread of the first fruits, twenty loaves [h]of barley, and full ears of corn in [†]the husk thereof: and he said, Give unto the people that they may eat.

43 And [i]his servitor said, [k]What! should I set this before an hundred men? He said again, Give the people, that they may eat: for thus saith the LORD, [l]They shall eat, and shall leave thereof.

44 So he set it before them; and they did eat, and left thereof, according to the word of the LORD.

CHAP. V.

Naaman, captain of the host of Syria, is a leper, 1. By the report of a captive maid of Israel, concerning the prophet, he comes to the king of Israel at Samaria to be healed, 2—7. Elisha sends for him; he goes to him, and is ordered to wash seven times in Jordan: he is angry; but, persuaded by his servants, he complies and is cleansed, 8—14. He acknowledges the true God; offers presents to Elisha, who refuses them; and is sent away in peace, resolving to worship the LORD alone, 15—19. Gehazi, by a lie, obtains presents from Naaman, and is punished by leprosy, entailed also on his descendants, 20—27.

He made hurtful food to become safe and wholesome.

The sons of the prophets should be examples of temperance and mortification, not desirous of dainties, but content with plain food: if they have neither savory meats, nor sweet meats, nay, if a mess of pottage be all the dinner, let them remember that this great prophet entertained himself and his guests with no better. What is called wild gourds, v. 39. some think was coloquintida, an herb strongly cathartic, and, if not qualified, dangerous. The sons of the prophets, it seems, were better skilled in divinity than in natural philosophy. Nature has given man the sense of tasting, not only that wholesome food may be pleasant, but that that which is unwholesome, may be discovered before it comes to the stomach, Job 12: 11. The table often becomes a snare, and that which should be for our welfare, proves a trap, which is a good reason why we should not feed ourselves without fear; when receiving the supports and comforts of life, we must keep up an expectation of death, and fear of sin.

It is probable there was meal in it before, but that was put in by a common hand, only to thicken the pottage; this (v. 41.) was the same thing, but cast in by Elisha's hand, and with intent to heal the pottage; by which it appears that the change was not owing to the meal, that was the sign only, not the means, but to the divine power. We must acknowledge God's goodness in making our food wholesome and nourishing; I am the Lord that healeth thee.

II. He made a little food to go a great way.

1. Elisha had a present brought him, v. 42. a present in those ages, not despicable at any time, but now in a special manner valuable, when there was a dearth in the land.

2. Having freely received, he freely gave. It well becomes the men of God to be generous and open-handed, and the fathers of the prophets to be liberal to the sons of the prophets.

3. Though the loaves were little, it is likely, no more than what one man would ordinarily eat at a meal, yet with 20 of them he satisfied 100 men, v. 43, 44. God has promised his church, (Ps. 132: 15.) that He will abundantly bless her provision, and satisfy her poor with bread; for whom He feeds, He fills, and what He blesses, comes to much, as what He blows upon, comes to little. Hag. 1: 9.

CHAP. V. V. 1—8. Our Savior's miracles

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 38—44. While the servants of the Lord are contented with mean accommodations, and put their trust in Him, He can make their coarsest fare pleasant. Let them but observe his directions, and He will not only supply their wants, but extract the death, the evil, from such things as most alarm them. When He pleases, the scantiest provisions shall suffice; and whilst He communicates to us, we should in faith impart a portion to others; and thus all will be clean and salutary to us. But to those who feed themselves without fear, [disregarding the laws of their organization, so seldom studied] their table becomes a snare, and perdition entwines around their sensual enjoyments. Aware of this danger, let us learn to use temporal good things with caution and moderation, in dependence on Him, by whose blessing alone our food is made wholesome and nutrimental. SCOTT.

Verses 38, 39.

(M. R.) Coloquintida is of a most nauseous bitter, and, if taken improperly, [and so Taylor] operates as a fatal poison. SCOTT. 'Celsius thus transl. the Heb. pekaoth. The leaves of the colocynth are large, placed alternate, the flowers white; and the fruit of the gourd kind, of the size of a large apple, which, when ripe, is yellow, and of a pleasant and inviting appearance; but to the taste intolerably bitter, and proves a drastic purgative.' HARRIS.

Verses 42—44.

The sons of the prophets seem at this time to have become very numerous: but perhaps some of the people, who came from a distance to receive instruction, shared the repast. And this might be one reason of the servant's objection, v. 43. (1—7. 1 K. 17:10—16.) SCOTT.

were for the lost sheep of the house of Israel, yet one, like a crumb, fell to a woman of Canaan; so, this one of Elisha, to Naaman, a Syrian; God does good to all, and will have all men to be saved. Here is,

I. Naaman's great affliction in the midst of all his honors, v. 1. He was a great man, particularly happy for two things, 1. He had been very serviceable to his country, God made him so; the preservation and prosperity even of those that do not know God and serve Him, must be ascribed to Him. Let Israel know that when the Syrians prevailed, it was from the Lord. 2. He was very acceptable to his prince, was his favorite, and prime-minister of state; so great, so high, so honorable, a mighty man of valor; but he was a leper, which made him loathsome and a burden to himself. Note, No man's greatness, or honor, or interest, or valor, or victory, can set him out of the reach of the sorest calamities of human life; there is many a sickly, crazy body under rich and gay clothing. Every man has some damp to his joy; he may be very happy, very good, yet, in something or other, not so good as he should be, nor so happy as he would be. Naaman was as great as the world could make him, yet (as Bp. Hall expresses it) the basest slave in Syria would not change skins with him.

II. The notice given him of Elisha's power, by a little maid, by birth an Israelite, providentially carried captive into Syria, and there preferred into Naaman's family, v. 2, 3. The unhappy dispersing of God's people has sometimes proved the happy occasion of the diffusion of the knowledge of God, Acts 8: 4. This little maid, 1. Consulted the honor of her country; could give an account, though but a girl, of the famous prophet they had among them. Children should early acquaint themselves with the wondrous works of God, that, wherever they go, they may have them to talk of. See Ps. 8: 2. 2. She desired the health and welfare of her master, though a captive, a servant by force; much more should servants of choice seek their master's good: the Jews in Babylon were to seek the peace of the land of their captivity, Jer. 29: 7. Elisha had not cleansed any lepers in Israel; (Luke 4: 27.) yet from the other miracles he had wrought, she infers he could cure her master, and from his common beneficence would, though he was a Syrian Servants may be blessings to the families where they are, by telling what they know of the glory of God, and the honor of his prophets.

III. The application which the king of Syria, hereupon, made to the king of Israel on Naaman's behalf. Naaman noticed the intelligence, and did not despise it. Oh that they who are spiritually diseased, would hearken thus readily to the tidings brought them of the great Physician!

See what Naaman did, on this little hint. 1 He would not send for the prophet to come to him but such honor would he pay to one that had so much of a divine power as to be able to cure diseases, he would go to him himself though sickly, unfit for society, the journey long, and the country an enemy's; princes, he thinks, must stoop to prophets, when they need them. 2. He would not go in disguise, but with a great retinue, the more to honor the prophet. 3. He would not go empty-handed, (what will we not give for ease,) nor without a letter to the king of Israel from the king his master, who himself earnestly desired his recovery; he takes it for granted the king knows where to find the prophet; and, to engage the prophet to do his utmost, he will go to him, supported with the interest of two kings. If the king of Syria must entreat his help, he hopes the king of Israel, being his liege-lord, may command it: the gifts of the subject must all be (he thinks) for the service and honor of the prince; therefore he desires the king that he would recover the leper, (v. 6.) taking it for granted there was a greater intimacy between the king and prophet than really there was.

IV. The alarm this gave the king of Israel, v. 7. He apprehended there was in this letter, 1. A great affront on God, therefore he rent his clothes, as was the Jews' custom, when they heard or read what they thought blasphemous; and what less could it be, than to attribute to him a divine power? 'No,' says he, 'I pretend not to such a power;' thus this great man, this bad man, is

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The Lord over-rules, to his own glory, those events which originate in man's wickedness: the young, or the poor, are often better acquainted with his servants and service, than the rich or aged: but as He works by despised instruments, so wise men will avail themselves of a useful hint from the lowest of their inferiors.—Kind behavior to domestics generally ensures a valuable recompense: and no injuries or hardships should indispose us to seek the welfare, or to compassionate the sorrows, of those among whom our lot is cast; especially when they are kind to us. This 'little maid' proved a richer treasure to Naaman, than any Ben-hadad could bestow: and good and pious servants are indeed invaluable benefits.—We carry our knowledge of God and of true religion with us, wherever we remove; none can deprive us of these true riches and this blessed liberty; and the meanest believer will find opportunities of glorifying God and being useful to man, if he act consistently with his character and profession: for such a conduct will attract regard from those who are ignorant or careless about religion, and dispose them to attend to his words, particularly in times of affliction. (P. O. Acts 8: 1—8.)

—The great ones of the earth are apt to suppose, that wealth, authority, and influence can command every thing: but when they seek those blessings which the Lord communicates in answer to the prayers of his faithful servants, they will find that nothing can be done in this way; but that they must act as poor and needy persons, and come as humble supplicants for a free gift, and not as lords to demand, or to purchase. (Notes, Matt. 5: 3. Jam. 1: 9—11.) For the ministers of God must obey man, only so far as the will of their great Master allows them: and in his service they must not be directed or dictated to by any human authority —The ignorance of many, in spiritual things, is manifested by every part of their conversation: yet we should not impute that to a blasphemous or malevolent intention, which they utter merely because they know no better.—No judges are more severe towards their fellow sinners, than those who themselves have no fear of God before their eyes: and they are especially quick sighted to the atrocious conduct of those, whom they suspect of intentions to injure them; and vehement in their declamations against the crimes, of which themselves are not known to be guilty. Verse 8.

Probably Elisha was at or near Samaria, when Naaman arrived. ID.

when Elisha the man of God had heard that the king of Israel had [p] rent his clothes, that he sent to the king, saying, Wherefore hast thou rent thy clothes? [q] let him come now to me, [r] and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel.

9 So [s] Naaman came with his horses and with his chariot, and stood at the door of the house of Elisha.

10 And Elisha [t] sent a messenger unto him, saying, Go and [u] wash in Jordan [x] seven times, and [y] thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean.

11 But [z] Naaman was wroth, and [a] went away, and said, [b] Behold, * I thought, He will surely come out to me, and stand, and call on the name of the LORD his God, and † strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper.

12 Are not ‡ Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, [c] better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them, and be clean? So he turned and went away in a rage.

13 And [d] his servants came near, and spake unto him, and said, [e] My father, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it? how much rather then, when he saith to thee, [f] Wash, and be clean?

14 Then [g] went he down, and dipped himself seven times in Jordan, [h] according to the saying of the man of God: and [i] his flesh came again like unto the flesh of a little child, [k] and he was clean.

made to own that he is but a man. Why did he not, upon this, correct himself for his idolatry? 'Shall I worship those as gods, that can neither kill nor make alive; can do neither good nor evil?' 2. A bad design on himself; which he suspects the rather, because Naaman was the king's general. Had he rightly understood that the king meant only, that he would take care he might be recovered, he had not been in this fright. Note, We often create uneasiness to ourselves, by misinterpreting the well intended words and actions of others; it is charity to ourselves, to think no evil. He is put into this confusion also, because a stranger to the prophet; the captive maid knew him better than the king did.

V. The proffer Elisha made of his service; though neglected, and forgotten, he was willing to do any thing to make his prince easy; hearing on what occasion the king had rent his clothes, he sent to him, to let him know that if his patient would come to him, he should not lose his labor, v. 8. not for his own honor, but for the honor of God, he would have them know there was a prophet in Israel, though obscure and overlooked.

V. 9—14. We have here the cure of Naaman's leprosy.

I. The short, plain direction of the prophet, v. 10. They that showed little respect to prophets at other times, when they needed them, were very complaisant to them, v. 9. They that would be cleansed from their spiritual leprosy, must wait at Wisdom's gate, and watch at the posts of her doors. Naaman expected to have his compliment returned, but Elisha answered him without formality; would not go to the door to him, but sent a messenger, saying, Go wash in Jordan seven times; this he meant not as the means of the cure; but only as a sign of the cure, and a trial of his obedience: they that will be helped of God, must do as He bids. But why did Elisha send a messenger to him with these directions? Because he was retired, at this time, for devotion, intent on his prayers for the cure, and would not be diverted; or, Because he knew Naaman to be a proud man, and would let him know, that before the great God, all men stand on the same level.

II. Naaman's disgust at the method prescribed, because not what he expected. Two things disgusted him; he thought, 1. Elisha slighted his person; sending orders by a servant, and not coming himself, v. 11. Big with the expectations of a cure, he had been fancying how this cure would be wrought, and because the thing is not done just thus, he falls into a passion, forgetting, (1.) He was a leper, and the law of Moses, which Elisha would religiously observe, shut lepers out from society; a leper, and therefore he ought not to insist on the punctilios of honor. Note, Many have hearts unhumbled under humbling providences; see Num. 12: 14 (2.) he was a petitioner, and beggars must not be choosers, patients not prescribe to their physician. See in Naaman the folly of pride; a cure will not content him, unless he be cured with ceremony, with pomp and parade; he scorns to be healed, unless he be humored. 2. His country; how magnificently he speaks of the two rivers that watered Damascus! how scornfully of all the waters of Israel! So common is it for God and man to differ in their judgments. How slightly does he speak of the prophet's directions! He was angry that the prophet bade him wash and be clean; he thought he would do all, or thinks this too cheap, too plain, too common; or did not believe it would at all affect the cure; or, if it would, what medicinal virtue was there in Jordan more than in the rivers of Damascus? He did not consider, (1.) That Jordan belonged to God's Israel, the glory of all lands, particularly for its brooks of water, Deut. 8: 7. and that, in a miraculous cure, relation to God was much more considerable than the depth of the channel, or the beauty of the stream. (2.) That Jordan had more than once obeyed the commands of Omnipotence; had, of old, yielded a passage to Israel, and, of late, to Elijah and Elisha, and therefore was fitter for such a purpose than those rivers which had only observed the common law of their creation, and had never been thus distinguished; above all, (3.) that Jordan was the river appointed, and if he expected a cure from the divine power, he ought to acquiesce in the divine will, without asking why or wherefore Note, It is common for those that are wise in their own conceits, to look with contempt on the dictates and prescriptions of divine wisdom, and to prefer their own fancies before them. Rom. 10: 3.

Naaman talked himself into such a heat, (as passionate men usually do,) that he turned away from the prophet's door in a rage, ready to swear he would never have any thing more to say to Elisha; and who then would be the loser? Note, They that observe lying vanities, forsake their own mercies, Jonah 2: 8. Proud men are the worst enemies to themselves, and forego their own redemption.

III. The modest advice his servants gave him, to observe the prophet's prescriptions, with an implied reproof of his resentments, v. 13. At other times, they kept their distance, and now saw him in a passion, yet, knowing him to be a man that would hear reason, (a good character of great men, but very rare,) they drew near, and made bold to argue the matter, v. 13. Note, It is a great mercy to have those about us, that will be free, and faithfully tell us of our faults and follies, though they be our inferiors. Masters must be willing to hear reason from their servants, Job 31: 13, 14. As we should be deaf to the counsel of the ungodly, though given by the greatest names, so we should have our ear open to good advice, though brought us by persons much below us: no matter who speaks, if it be well said. Observe,

1. The reproof was very modest and respectful; they call him, Father; servants must honor and obey their masters. In giving reproof and counsel, we must make it appear, that it comes from love and true honor, and that we intend, not reproach, but reformation.

2. It was very rational and considerate. If the rude and unthinking servants had stirred up their master's angry resentment, and offered to avenge his quarrel on the prophet, who, (he thought) affronted him, how mischievous had the consequences been! Fire from heaven, probably, on them all! But they, to our great surprise, took the prophet's part. They reason with him, (1.) From his earnest desire of a cure; Wouldest not thou do any thing? Note, When diseased sinners are content to do any thing, to submit to any thing, to part with any thing, for a cure, then, and not till then, we begin to indulge some hopes of them. Then they will take Christ on his own terms, when they are made willing to have Christ on any terms. (2.) From the easiness of the method prescribed; it is but, Wash and be clean. Note, The methods prescribed for the healing of the leprosy of sin, are so plain, that we are utterly inexcusable if we do not observe them. It is but, 'Believe, and be saved,' 'Repent,

Verses 13, 14.

This Syrian was favored with very prudent, respectful, and affectionate servants; and probably he was in general a kind and considerate master. (1 Sam. 25:14—17.) They had, it may be supposed, heard a great deal from the Israelitish maid [or from the Israelites about Elisha] of Elisha's miracles; and were very desirous that Naaman should make the trial.—'This was the only cure of a leprosy, that we read of, till Christ, the great Prophet, came into the world.' Bp. Patrick. Though the remark be not quite correct, it is entitled to consideration. Miriam was cleansed, in answer to the prayer of Moses; but no other instance is recorded. (Num. 12:9—15.) SCOTT.

RIVER JORDAN.—Joshua, iii. iv. ; 2 Kings, v. 10.

15 And [l]he returned to the man of God, he and all his company, and came and stood before him: and he said, Behold, [m]now I know that there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel; now therefore, I pray thee, take [n]a blessing of thy servant.

16 But he said, [o]As the LORD liveth, before whom I stand, [p]I will receive none. And he urged him to take it; but he refused.

17 And Naaman said, Shall there not then, I pray thee, be given to thy servant two mules' burden [q]of earth? for thy servant [r]will henceforth offer neither burnt-offering nor sacrifice unto other gods, but unto the LORD.

18 In this thing the LORD pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he [s]leaneth on my hand, [t]and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, [u]the LORD pardon thy servant in this thing.

19 And [x]he said unto him, [y]Go in peace. So he departed from him a [*]little way.

20 ¶ But [z]Gehazi the servant of Elisha the man of God said, Behold, [a]my master hath spared Naaman this Syrian, in not receiving at his hands that which he brought:

pent, and be pardoned,' 'Wash, and be clean.'

IV. The cure effected, in the use of the means prescribed, v. 14. This, men get by yielding to the will of God, by attending to his institutions. His being cleansed by washing, put an honor on the law for cleansing lepers: God will magnify his Word above all his name.

V. 15—19. Naaman here bespeaks himself, I. Convinced of the power of the God of Israel, not only that He is God, but God alone, and indeed that there is no God in all the earth but in Israel, v. 15. A noble confession, but such as bespeaks the misery of the Gentile world. Those are best able to speak of the power of divine grace, who have themselves experienced it.

II. Grateful to Elisha the prophet. He valued the cure, and would gladly pay for it accordingly; but Elisha generously refused the fee, even with an oath, though urged to accept it, v. 16; not because he did not need it, he was poor enough, knew what to do with it, and how to bestow it; nor did he think it unlawful, he received presents from others; but he would not be beholden to this Syrian, Gen. 14: 23. It would be much for the honor of God, to show this new convert that the servants of the God of Israel were taught to look on the wealth of this world with a holy contempt, which would confirm him in his belief, that there is no God but in Israel. See 1 Cor. 9: 18. 2 Cor. 11: 9.

III. Proselyted to the worship of the God of Israel. He resolves he will never offer sacrifice to any other gods, v. 17. It was a happy cure of his leprosy, which cured him of his idolatry, a more dangerous disease. But here are two instances of his weakness and infirmity in his conversion.

1. In one instance, he over-did it; he would have clods of earth (Ex. 20: 24.) out of the prophet's garden, or, at least, of the prophet's ordering, to make an altar of, v. 17. He that, a while ago, had spoken very slightly of the waters of Israel, (v. 12.) now is in another extreme, and over-values the earth of Israel, not considering that all the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. Or, perhaps, the transport of his affection and veneration for the prophet, not only on the account of his power, but of his virtue and generosity, made him, as we say, love the very ground he went on, and desire to have some of it home with him. The modern compliment equivalent to this, would be, 'Pray, sir, let me have your picture.'

2. In another instance, he under-did it; he reserved to himself a liberty to bow in the house of Rimmon, in complaisance to the king his master, and according to the duty of his place at court, v. 18. He owns he ought not to do it, but he cannot otherwise keep his place; protests his bowing is not, nor ever shall be, as it had been, in honor to the idol, but only in honor to the king; therefore he hopes God will forgive him. Perhaps, all things considered, this might admit of some apology, though it was not altogether justifiable. But as to us, I am sure, (1.) If, in covenanting with God, we make a reservation for any known sin, which we will continue to indulge in, that reservation is a defeasance of his covenant. We must cast away all our transgressions, and not except any house of Rimmon. (2.) Though encouraged to pray for the remission of our sins, yet if we ask for a dispensation to go on in any sin for the future, we mock God, and deceive ourselves. (3.) Those that know not how to quit a place at court, when they cannot keep it without sinning against God, and wronging their consciences, do not rightly value the divine favor. (4.) Those that truly hate evil, will make conscience of abstaining from all appearances of evil. Though Naaman's dissembling of his religion cannot be approved, yet because his promise, to offer no sacrifice to any but the God of Israel only, was a great point gained with a Syrian, and because, by asking pardon in this matter, he showed such a degree of conviction and ingenuousness as gave hopes of improvement, the prophet took fair leave of him, and bid him Go in peace, v. 19. Young converts must be tenderly dealt with.

V. 20—27. Naaman, a Syrian, a courtier, a soldier, had many servants, wise and good, v. 13. Elisha, a holy prophet, has but one, and he proves a base liar. Christ himself had a Judas among his followers. The means of grace cannot give grace.

Here is, I. Gehazi's complicated sin.

The love of money, that root of all evil, was at the bottom of it. Multitudes, by coveting worldly wealth, have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves with many sorrows. He not only imposed on Naaman, but basely misrepresented and abused his master. When Naaman, like a person of accomplished manners, alighted from his chariot to meet him, (v. 21.) he told him a deliberate lie, and so received that courtesy to himself, which Naaman intended to his master; he represented, too, that his master had soon repented of his generosity, was fickle, and did not know his own mind, would say and unsay, swear and un-

Verses 15, 16.

What an awful representation does this give us of the state of the Gentiles, 'without hope, and without God in the world!' (Eph. 2:11—13.)—The case of Naaman was singular. It was of great importance what impressions he, at that crisis, should receive, concerning the God of Israel and his worshippers. Elisha would appear, as he was, perfectly disinterested. For 'it gives great authority to a teacher of virtue, not to be covetous.' Bp. Patrick. SCOTT.

Verse 17—19.

Some learned men have thought, that Naaman's conduct in bowing in the idol temple was justifiable; because he was not an Israelite, and so not under the law of Moses. It is evident, however, that the prohibition of every kind and degree of idolatry, belongs to the moral law, which is universally obligatory. Our strict rule of duty certainly forbids such a conformity; the Gospel grants no dispensations; and, in similar circumstances, a Christian would be absolutely required to renounce every advantage and preferment, which could not be retained without such communion with idolaters, and countenance of idolatry; nay, to endure the utmost effects of the persecutor's rage, rather than make such compliances, however palliated by salvos and mental reserves: [and the history of the primitive church, shows its opinion to have been the same.] (Dan. 3:8—18.) The prophet however seems to have perceived, that Naaman was convinced, that even bowing with the king in the house of Rimmon was not right, and he left those convictions gradually to produce their effects: if they were the result of regenerating grace, they would in time bring him to make a more public protest against idolatry, when his faith, judgment, and experience were matured. Moreover, as the whole work was from God in so extraordinary a manner, it is probable, that the prophet declined interposing his private judgment, when he had no immediate directions from heaven respecting it.—'In this thing the LORD pardon thy servant, that when my lord went into the house of Rimmon, to bow down himself there, and leaned on my hand, I bowed down myself there; that I bowed down myself—the LORD pardon thy servant in this thing.' (Whitby, Note on Luke 12. 2.) This would imply, that Naaman had previously favorable thoughts of true religion, and had not been an idolater in other respects; though he had conformed in this particular, which now appeared to him the most heinous of his sins. Yet there is no intimation, that he had not been as gross an idolater as the other Syrians. This translation, which many learned men have endeavored to establish, disregards the vau conversive, which generally changes the preterite into the future. All the versions, or ancient translations, understand the words of the future, and not of the past.—Elisha seems also to have been silent concerning the earth, which Naaman requested, and probably for the reasons before mentioned. (Matt. 9:16, 17.) Nor was any thing proposed to him, concerning his embracing in other respects the religion of Israel. SCOTT.

swear; and would not do an honorable thing, but he must presently undo it again. His story of the two sons of the prophets was as silly as it was false; if he would have begged a token for two young scholars, surely less than a talent of silver [above £350 stg. Scott.] might serve them.

There was danger of his alienating Naaman from that holy religion he had espoused. He would be ready to say, as Paul's enemies suggested of him, that though Elisha himself did not burden him, yet, being crafty, he caught him with guile, sending those that made a gain of him. We hope he understood afterward, that Elisha's hand was not in it, and that Gehazi was forced to restore what he had unjustly got, else it might have driven him to his idols again.

His seeking to conceal what he had unjustly got, added much to his sin. 1. He hid it, as Achan did his gain, by sacrilege, in a secret, strong place, till he should have opportunity of laying it out, v. 24. 2. He denied it: he went in, and stood before his master, ready to receive his orders. His master asked him, where he had been. 'No where, sir,' (said he) 'out of the house.' Note, One lie commonly begets another: the way of that sin is down hill; therefore dare to be true.

II. The punishment of this sin. Observe,

1. How he was convicted. He thought to impose on the prophet, as Ananias and Sapphira on the apostles, but was soon given to understand the Spirit of prophecy could not be deceived. 'Went not my heart [i. e. mind] with thee?' v. 26. Note, It is folly to presume on sin, in hopes of secrecy. When thou goest aside into any by-path, does not thy own conscience go with thee? Does not the eye of God go with thee? He that covers his sin, shall not prosper; particularly, a lying tongue is but for a moment, Prov. 12: 19. Truth will transpire, and often comes to light, strangely, to the confusion of those that make lies their refuge. What he designed, he kept in his own breast; but Elisha could tell him the very thoughts he was projecting, now that he had got these two talents, to purchase ground and cattle, to leave Elisha's service, and to set up for himself. Note, All the foolish hopes and contrivances of carnal worldlings are open before God. 'Is it a time to receive money? Couldest thou find no better a way of getting money, than by belying thy master, and laying a stumbling block before a young convert?' Note, Those that are for getting wealth at any time, and by any ways and means whatsoever, right or wrong, lay themselves open to a great deal of temptation. They that will be rich, by fair means or by foul; careless of principle, intent only on money, drown themselves in destruction and perdition, 1 Tim. 6: 9. War, and fire, and plague, and shipwreck, are not, as many make them, times to get money. It is not a time to increase our wealth, when we cannot do it but in such ways as are dishonorable to God and religion, or injurious to our brethren, or the public.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8—27. The minister of God should seize every opportunity to evince the truth and importance of his religious principles, and to display the glorious perfections of the Lord.—All the commands of God are suited to make trial of men's spirits; especially those which direct a sinner how to apply for the blessings of salvation. These do not accord with the self-importance and self-sufficiency, the carnal prejudices and pompous ideas, of an unbumbled heart: nor can they be cordially attended to, except by 'the poor in spirit,' or without that implicit faith which produces as implicit obedience. The way of a sinner's acceptance and sanctification, by the blood and Spirit of Christ, through faith alone in his name, does not sufficiently gratify or employ self, to please the sinner's heart. The method seems to many futile and inadequate: human wisdom and philosophy, (like Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus,) can furnish more rational and eligible methods of cleansing: nay, the operose and austere devices of superstition appear to numbers preferable to 'the Fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness;' and the very proposal shocks and affronts all the sons of pride and self-sufficiency. But the sinner, who is deeply burdened with guilt, and longs to escape the wrath to come, and the service of Satan, would do 'great things,' if required, for that purpose. If pilgrimages, mortifications, and austerities could avail, they would not be evaded: to torture his body, to part with his wealth, or even lay down his life, would be deemed a low price at which to purchase forgiveness of sins and eternal salvation; but none of these things, in this use of them, can be accepted. (Mic. 6: 6—8.) As, however, the Fountain is opened, and the access free, he will 'much more wash and be clean,' as the Lord has directed.—Salvation is from the love and power of God, in the way of his appointing and revealing, for his own glory, and in the use of those means which He has instituted. In this manner the believer seeks for it, not neglecting, altering, or adding to the Savior's directions; and by repeated washings he is made clean from the guilt and pollution of sin: whilst others, neglecting this great salvation, through proud contempt, sensual indulgence, covetousness, or sloth, live and die in their leprosy, and must for ever be excluded from the presence of a holy God.—When temporal troubles and deliverances bring us acquainted with God, and lead us to his service, they are indeed precious blessings; and gratitude to the Lord will dictate liberality to the instruments of his mercies. From knowledge of the world, the great are apt to suspect all their inferiors of mercenary designs, and naturally suppose that ministers are only carrying on a trade like other men; while the conduct of too many so called confirms them in this sentiment. There is but one way of counteracting this prejudice; and that is by evidencing a disinterested spirit, and not asking any thing, and in many cases refusing to accept favors from them, until they have attained a further establishment in the faith; and by always persevering in an indifference to every personal interest.—It is not advisable violently to oppose every mistake which unites with men's first convictions, lest we should damp that earnestness which promises good fruit, when matured by experience, and duly regulated by the gradual teaching of the divine Spirit, attending suitable instruction. We cannot bring men forward faster, than the Lord prepares them to receive instruction: and where He works, He will in time lead them to renounce every secular interest, and bear any cross rather than sin against Him.—Let us beware of hypocrisy and covetousness, and dread above all things the curse of spiritual leprosy, remaining upon our souls, living and dying, and for ever. CHAP. VI.

The sons of the prophets prepare to enlarge their dwelling, and Elisha causes iron to swim, 1—7. He discloses to Jehoram the counsels of the Syrian king, who sends troops to apprehend him, 8—14. Elisha's servant is terrified; but is encouraged by seeing horses and chariots of fire round his master, 15—17. The Syrians, at Elisha's prayer, are partially blinded; and he conducts them into Samaria, where they regain their sight, and by the prophet's proposal are entertained, and dismissed in peace, 18—23. Ben-hadad besieges Samaria, and reduces it to extreme famine, 24, 25. Women contest about eating their own children; and appeal to the king, who in a rage resolves to kill Elisha, 26—33.

AND [a] the sons of the prophets said unto Elisha, Behold now, [b] the place where we dwell with thee is [c] too strait for us.

2 Let us go, we pray thee, unto Jordan, [d] and take thence every man a beam, and let us make us a place there, where we may dwell. And he answered, Go ye.

3 And one said, [e] Be content, I pray thee, and [f] go with thy servants. And he answered, I will go.

4 So he went with them. And when they came to Jordan, [g] they cut down wood.

5 But as one was felling a beam, the * axe-head fell into the water: and he cried, and said, [h] Alas, master! [i] for it was borrowed.

6 And the man of God said, Where fell it? And he showed him the place. And he [k] cut down a stick, and cast it in thither, and the iron did swim.

7 Therefore said he, [l] Take it up to thee. And he [m] put out his hand, and took it.

[Practical Observations.]

8 ¶ Then [n] the king of Syria warred against Israel, and [o] took counsel with his servants, saying, In such and such a place shall be my camp.

9 And the man of God sent unto the king of Israel, saying, Beware that thou pass not such a place; for thither the Syrians are coming down.

10 And the king of Israel sent to the place which the man of God told him and warned him of, and saved himself there, not once nor twice.

11 Therefore the heart of the king of Syria was sore troubled for this thing; and he called his servants, and said unto them, Will ye not show me which of us is for the king of Israel?

12 And one of his servants said, None, my lord, O king: but Elisha, the prophet that is in Israel, tells the king of Israel the words that thou speakest in thy bedchamber.

13 And he said, Go and spy where he is, that I may send and fetch him. And it was told him, saying, Behold, he is in Dothan.

14 Therefore sent he thither horses, and chariots, and a great host: and they came by night, and compassed the city about.

15 ¶ And when the servant of the man of God was risen early, and gone forth, behold, a host compassed the city both with horses and chariots. And his servant said unto him, Alas, my master! how shall we do?

16 And he answered, Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with them.

17 And Elisha prayed, and said, LORD, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see. And the LORD opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha.

18 And when they came down to him, Elisha prayed unto the LORD, and said, Smite this people, I pray thee, with blindness. And he smote them with blindness according to the word of Elisha.

19 And Elisha said unto them, This is not the way, neither is this the city: follow me, and I will bring you to the man whom ye seek. But he led them to Samaria.

20 And it came to pass, when they were come into Samaria, that Elisha said, LORD, open the eyes of these men, that they may see. And the LORD opened their eyes, and they saw; and, behold, they were in the midst of Samaria.

21 And the king of Israel said unto Elisha, when he saw them, My father, shall I smite them? shall I smite them?

22 And he answered, Thou shalt not smite them: wouldest thou smite those whom thou hast taken captive with thy sword and with thy bow? set bread and water before them, that they may eat and drink, and go to their master.

23 And he prepared great provision for them: and when they had eaten and drunk, he sent them away, and they went to their master. So the bands of Syria came no more into the land of Israel.

24 ¶ And it came to pass after this, that Ben-hadad king of Syria gathered all his host, and went up, and besieged Samaria.

25 And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver.

26 ¶ And as the king of Israel was passing upon the wall, there cried a woman unto him, saying, Help, my lord, O king.

27 And he said, If the LORD do not help thee, whence shall I help thee? out of the barnfloor, or out of the winepress?

28 And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, This woman said unto me, Give thy son, that we may eat him to-day, and we will eat my son to-morrow.

29 So we boiled my son, and did eat him: and I said unto her on the next day, Give thy son, that we may eat him: and she hath hid her son.

30 ¶ And it came to pass, when the king heard the words of the woman, that he rent his clothes; and he passed by upon the wall, and the people looked, and, behold, he had sackcloth within upon his flesh.

31 Then he said, God do so and more also to me, if the head of Elisha the son of Shaphat shall stand on him this day.

32 But Elisha sat in his house, and the elders sat with him; and the king sent a man from before him: but ere the messenger came to him, he said to the elders, See ye how this son of a murderer hath sent to take away mine head? look, when the messenger cometh, shut the door, and hold him fast at the door: is not the sound of his master's feet behind him?

33 And while he yet talked with them, behold, the messenger came down unto him: and he said, Behold, this evil is of the LORD; what should I wait for the LORD any longer?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. God has often increased his church, by the addition of faithful ministers and true believers, in times of great persecution: for the whole glory is secured to Him, when the effect is produced without the aid, and notwithstanding the opposition, of human authority, by the preaching of his Word, and the operation of the Holy Spirit. (Zech. 4: 4—7.)—Religion indeed always appears to advantage under the cross; when poverty and affliction are endured with cheerful meekness and patience, and when hard labor and mean fare excite no complaints. When men, honored by the Lord as instruments of much good to souls, willingly earn their living by working at some honest calling, rather than burden the people; and yet will not entangle themselves with the affairs of the world to acquire riches for themselves or families; their conduct evidently accords to the spirit of true religion, and seldom fails to attract the attention of numbers to persons, who act on principles, contrary to the general [selfish] propensities of human nature.—There is that pleasantness in the converse of the eminent servants of God, which can make men forget the pain and weariness of labor: and when condescension to the meanest unites with usefulness to the greatest, and with great eminence in the church of God, it confers a peculiar lustre on a man's character.

SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—7. Probably, this event occurred either at Gilgal, or at Jericho, both of which were near Jordan.—It is not certain, whether the building intended was a place of assembly, where the prophets met for religious exercises with other pious Israelites; or whether they purposed to live together in it, with their families, as a collected body separate from others.—Probably they were accustomed to work in one way or other, that the people might not be burdened. (Acts 18:1—6. 1 Cor. 4:9—13. 2 Cor. 11:7—12. 2 Thes. 3:6—9.)—In so small a matter the Lord was pleased to work a miracle, to compose the young prophet's mind, to put honor on Elisha, to enable the company to proceed with their undertaking, and to encourage their faith and hope!—It is useless to inquire, in what way he made the iron to swim. (4:40, 41.)

[Practical Observations.]

Elisha was much concerned for the satisfaction of his servant. Good men desire, not only to be easy themselves, but to have those about them easy. They whose faith is strong, ought tenderly to consider and compassionate those who are weak, and of a timorous spirit, and to do what they can, to strengthen their hands. As angels are God's messengers, so they are his soldiers, his hosts (Gen. 32: 2.) his legions, or regiments, (Matt. 26: 53.) for the good of his people. For the satisfaction of his servant, there needed no more than the opening of his eyes; that therefore he prayed for, and obtained for him. The eyes of his body were open, and with them he saw the danger; 'Lord, open the eyes of his faith, that with them he may see the protection we are under.' Note, The greatest kindness we can do for the fearful and faint-hearted, is, to pray for them, and so to recommend them to the mighty grace of God. The opening of our eyes will silence our fears; the clearer sight we have of the sovereignty and power of heaven, the less we shall fear the calamities of earth.

III. The shameful defeat Elisha gave the host of Syrians, *v.*18. 1. They were confounded; those among them whom they depended on for information, did not know this place to be Dothan, nor this person to be Elisha, but groped at noon-day as in the night; (Isa. 59: 10. Job 12: 24, 25.) their memory failed them, and their distinguishing faculty: they could see the light, but their sight was so altered, that they knew neither the persons nor places they were before acquainted with. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8—23. The Lord knows, and can easily defeat, the secret machinations of his enemies. And the profession of being his worshippers will sometimes for a season engage his external protection; in order to the confusion of his avowed enemies, and for the sake of that remnant of true believers with whom they are connected. (Ex. 32: 7—14. Deut. 32: 26, 27. Jer. 14: 7—9. Ez. 20: 7—9.)—The obstinate rebellion and blindness of fallen man often induce him to strive and expect to prevail against those, whom he cannot deny to be the people of God: but as no outward miracles can extirpate the malignity of the heart, so nothing can injure those whom the Lord protects.—Strong faith will supply the want of sight: it realizes both the danger and the security, and with a clear idea of the force of the enemy confidently answers, 'Fear not, for they that be with us, are more than they, that be with them.' May God give us this faith, and especially strengthen it in the time of danger, and in the hour of death! SCOTT.

24 ¶ And it came to pass after this, that Ben-hadad king of Syria [x] gathered all his host, and went up, and besieged Samaria.

25 And there was [y] a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until [z] an ass's head was sold for four-score pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver.

26 And as the king of Israel was passing by upon the wall, there cried a woman unto him, saying, [a] Help, my lord, O king.

27 And he said, * If the LORD do not help thee, [b] whence shall I help thee? out of the barn-floor, or out of the wine-press?

28 And the king said unto her, [c] What aileth thee? And she answered, This woman said unto me, [d] Give thy son that we may eat him to-day, and we will eat my son to-morrow.

29 So we boiled my son, and did eat him: and I said unto her on the † next day, Give thy son, that we may eat him; and * she hath hid her son.

30 And it came to pass, when the king heard the words of the woman, that [f] he rent his clothes; and he passed by upon the wall, and the people looked, and behold he had sackcloth within upon his flesh.

understanding of men, both ways; He enlightened the eyes of Elisha's friend, and darkened the eyes of his foes, that they might see indeed, but not perceive, Isa. 6: 9. For this twofold judgment Christ came into this world, that they which see not, might see, and that they which see, might be made blind; (John. 9: 39.) as a savor of life to some, of death to others.

2. He led them to Samaria, (v. 19.) promising to show them the man they sought, and did so. He did not lie to them, when he told them, This is not the way, nor is this the city where Elisha is; for he was now come out of the city; and if they would see him, they must go to another city which he would direct them to. They that fight against God and his prophets deceive themselves, and are justly given to delusions.

3. When he had brought them to Samaria, he prayed God so to open their eyes, and restore them their memories, that they might see where they were; (v. 20.) and, behold, to their great terror, they were in the midst of Samaria, where, probably, was a standing force sufficient to cut them all off, or make them prisoners of war. The enemies of God and his church, when they fancy themselves ready to triumph, will find themselves conquered and triumphed over.

4. When he had them at his mercy, he made it appear he was influenced by a divine goodness, as well as a divine power.

(1.) He took care to protect them from the danger into which he had brought them, and was content to show them what he could have done; he needed not the sword of an angel to avenge his cause, the sword of the king of Israel is at his service, if he pleases, v. 21. But they were brought hither, to be convinced and ashamed, not killed, v. 22. Had they been the king's prisoners, it had been perfidious to do them hurt; it is against the law of arms to kill men in cool blood [though it was then done by the Egyptians, &c.]; but they were not his prisoners, they were God's prisoners, and the prophet's, therefore he must do them no harm; they that humble themselves under God's hand, take the best course to secure themselves.

(2.) He took care to provide for them; he ordered the king to treat them handsomely, and then dismiss them fairly, which he did, v. 23. It was the king's praise, that he was so obsequious to the prophet, and the prophet's praise, that he was so generous to his enemies. The great duty of loving enemies, and doing good to those that hate us, was both commanded, in the Old Testament, (Prov. 25: 21, 22. Ex. 23: 4, 5.) and practised, as here by Elisha; his predecessor had given a specimen of divine justice, when he called for flames of fire on the heads of his persecutors to consume them, but he gave a specimen of divine mercy, in heaping coals of fire on the heads of his persecutors to melt them; let not us then be overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.

Lastly, The good effect this had, for the present, on the Syrians; they came no more into the land of Israel, (v. 23.) namely, on this errand, to take Elisha; they saw it was to no purpose to attempt that, nor would any of their bands be persuaded to make an assault on so great and good a man. The most glorious victory over an enemy is to turn him into a friend.

V. 24—33. This last paragraph of this ch. should, of right, have been the first of the next, for it begins a new story, which is there continued and concluded.

Here is, I. The siege of Samaria, and the great distress thereby; the Syrians had soon forgotten the kindnesses lately received in Samaria, and very ungratefully, for aught that appears, without provocation, seek its destruction, v. 24. Those are base spirits, that show no lasting gratitude. The country, we may suppose, was plundered and laid waste, when this capital city was brought to the last extremity, v. 25. The dearth which had of late been in the land was, probably, the occasion of the emptiness of their stores; or the siege was so sudden, they had not time to lay in provisions: so that while the sword devoured without, the famine within was more grievous; (Lam. 4: 9.) for, it should seem, the Syrians designed not to storm the city, but to starve it. An ass's head has but little flesh on it, and that unsavory, unwholesome, and ceremonially unclean, yet it sold for five pounds; and a small quantity of fitches, or lentiles, or some such coarse corn, then called dove's dung, no more of it than the quantity of six eggs, for five pieces of silver, about twelve or fifteen shillings. Learn to value plenty, and to be thankful for it; see how contemptible money is, when, in time of famine, it is so freely parted with for any thing that is eatable.

II. The sad complaint a poor woman had to make to the king, in the extremity of the famine; he was passing by upon the wall to give orders for the mounting of the guard, the posting of the archers, the repair of the breaches, and the like, when a woman of the city cried to him, Help, my lord, O king, v. 26. Some think his return, (v. 27.) was a quarrelling word, and the language of his fretfulness.—It rather seems to be a quieting word; 'Let us be content, and make the best of our affliction, looking up to God, for till He help us, I cannot help thee.' He laments the emptiness of the floor and the wine-press; and acknowledges himself thereby disabled to help, unless God would help them. Note, Creatures are helpless things without God, for every creature is that, all that, and only that, which He makes it to be. However, though he cannot help her, he is willing to hear her; v. 28. 'Is there any thing singular in thy case, or dost thou fare worse than thy neighbors?' Truly yes,—v. 28, 29. See an instance of the dominion the flesh has got above the spirit, when the most natural affections may be thus overpowered by the natural appetites: see the word of God fulfilled; among the threatenings of God's judgments on Israel for their sins, this was one, Deut. 28: 53—57.

III. The king's indignation against Elisha, on this occasion; he lamented the calamity, v. 30. as one heartily concerned for the misery of his people, and that it was not in his power to help them; but he laments not his own iniquity, nor the iniquity of his people, which was the procuring cause of the calamity; he is not sensible that his ways and his doings have procured this to himself; this is his wickedness, for it is bitter; the foolishness of man perverts his way, and then his heart frets against the Lord; instead of vowing to pull down the calves at Dan and Beth-el, or letting the law have its course against the prophets of Baal, and of the groves, he swears the death of Elisha, v. 31. Why, what is the matter? What has Elisha done? His head is the most innocent and valuable in all Israel, and yet that must be devoted, and made an anathema. Thus in the days of the persecuting emperors, when the empire groaned under any extraordinary calamity, the fault was laid on the Christians, and they were doomed to destruction. Perhaps Jehoram was in this heat against Elisha, because he had foretold this judgment, or had persuaded him to

If the pieces of silver here mentioned were shekels, above ten pounds sterling was, on this occasion, paid for the ass's head; whilst about twelve shillings were given for about three pints of very mean pulse, called dove's dung; or, as some think, of the undigested corn taken from the crop, or craw, of that fowl. It is sufficient to suppose, that each of these bargains was once actually made, in the urgency of hunger. SCOTT.

Doves' dung.] 'The Tamul translation has, doves' grain: which is known in the E. by the name of Kára-manne-piru. Boothr. tr. it "a cab of vetches," which amounts to about the same thing. Boch. Clarke, and many others believe it to have been pulse. I have often eaten the pulse the pigeons are so fond of, and have found it very wholesome either in puddings or soup. The Orientals are exceedingly fond of eating leguminous grains, when parched; (Lev. 23:14. Ruth 2: 14. 2 Sam. 17:28.) and it is surprising to see to what a great distance they will travel on only that food and water. It was therefore in consequence of the famine that this, their favorite, and generally very cheap, sustenance was so dear.' Roberts. 'At Cairo and Damascus are magazines of this grain (peas, vetches, or parched pulse). It is now called by the Arabs "doves' dung."' Cond. Comm. ED.

Verse 27.

(M.) This may be understood as the language of passion, or desperation: as if Jehoram had said, 'The Lord will not, and I cannot, help thee; but we must all perish together.' SCOTT.

31 Then he said, [s] God do so and more also to me [h] if the head of Elisha the son of Shaphat shall stand on him this day.

32 But Elisha sat in his house, and [i] the elders sat with him; and the king sent a man from before him: but [k] ere the messenger came to him, he said to the elders, [l] See how this [m] son of a murderer hath sent to take away mine head? look when the messenger cometh, shut the door, and hold him fast at the door: is not [n] the sound of his master's feet behind him?

33 And while he yet talked with them, behold, the messenger came down unto him: and he said, Behold, [o] this evil is of the LORD; what should I [p] wait for the LORD any longer?

CHAP. VII.

Elisha predicts great plenty in Samaria, and the death of an unbelieving lord, 1, 2. Four lepers venture into the Syrian camp, and bring word that it is entirely deserted, a terror from God having driven away the army, 3—11. Jehoram fears a stratagem, sends messengers to examine, and finds the report true, 12—15. The people spoil the Syrian camp; the predicted plenty takes place; and the unbelieving lord, having charge of the gate, is trodden to death, 16—20.

THEN [a] Elisha said, Hear ye the word of the LORD, Thus saith the LORD, [b] To-morrow about this time shall [c] a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures [d] of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria.

2 Then * a lord, on whose hand the king leaned, answered the man of God, and said, Behold, [e] if the LORD would make [f] windows in heaven, might this thing be? And he said, Behold, [g] thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof.

3 And there were [h] four leprous men at hold out, and not surrender, or rather, because he did not, by his prayers, raise the siege, and relieve the city, which he thought he could do, but would not; whereas till they repented and reformed, and were ready for deliverance, they had no reason to expect the prophet should pray for it.

IV. The foresight Elisha had of the king's design against him, v. 32. The same spirit of prophecy that enabled Elisha to tell what was done at a distance, authorized him to call the king the son of a murderer, which, unless we could produce such an extraordinary commission, it is not for us to imitate; far be it from us to despise dominion, and to speak evil of dignities. He appeals to the elders, whether he had deserved so ill at the king's hands; see whether in this he be not the son of a murderer? For, what evil had Elisha done? He had not desired the woful day, Jer. 17: 16.

V. The king's passionate speech, when he came to prevent the execution of his edict for the beheading of Elisha; he seems to have been in a struggle between his convictions and his corruptions, knew not what to say, but, seeing things brought to the last extremity, he even abandons himself to despair; (v. 33.) This evil is of the Lord: therein his notions were right, and well applied; it is a general truth, that all penal evil is of the Lord, as the First Cause, and Sovereign Judge, (Amos 3: 6.) and this we ought to apply to particular cases; if all evil, then this evil, whatever it is we are now groaning under; whoever are the instruments, God is the principal Agent of it; but his inference from this truth was foolish and wicked, What should I wait for the Lord any longer? When Eli, and David, and Job, said, It is of the Lord, they grew patient upon it, but this bad man grew outrageous. 'I will neither fear worse, for worse cannot, nor expect better, for better never will, come; we are all undone, and there is no remedy.' It is an unreasonable thing to be weary of waiting for God, for He is a God of judgment, and blessed are all they that wait for Him.

CHAP. VII. V. 1, 2.—Relief is here brought to Samaria and her king, when the case was, in a manner, desperate, and the king despairing.

Here, 1. Elisha foretells, that, notwithstanding the great straits the city of Samaria was reduced to, within 24 hours they should have plenty, v. 1. he said this, then, when things were at the worst; man's extremity is God's opportunity; his time to appear for his people, is, when their strength is gone, Deut. 32: 36. When they had given over expecting help it came. The king said, What should I wait for the Lord any longer? And perhaps some of the elders were ready to say the same; 'Well,' said Elisha, 'you hear what these say; now hear ye the word of the Lord, hear what He says, hear it and heed it, hear it and believe it; to-morrow, corn shall be sold at the usurate in the gate of Samaria;' that is, (1.) The siege shall be raised, the gate of the city opened, and the market held there as formerly; the return of peace is thus expressed, Judg. 5: 11. Then shall the people of the Lord go down to the gates, to buy and sell there. (2.) The consequence shall be great plenty; this would, in time, follow, of course, but that corn should be thus cheap in so short a time, was quite beyond what could be thought of.

2. A peer of Israel, that happened to be present, openly declared his disbelief of this prediction, v. 2. He was a courtier whom the king had an affection for, on whose prudence he much relied, and in whom he reposed much confidence; he thought it impossible, unless God should rain corn out of the clouds, as once He did manna; no less than the repetition of Moses's miracle will serve him, though that of Elijah might have served to answer this intention, the increasing of the meal in the barrel.

3. The just doom passed on him for his infi-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24—33. The regard wicked men pay to the servants of God, when they seem to favor them, is frequently turned into bitter enmity under their troubles.—In extreme distress, if they recollect that their affliction is from the Lord, that rage against Him, which vents itself in blasphemies, dictates also cruelty against his people. They blame any one as the cause of their calamities, rather than condemn themselves, and renounce their sins.—Alas! what miseries has sin entailed on mankind! Little do we know what extremities we may be called to endure in this world: what then will be the everlasting wrath of God against his enemies, in the world to come? But if we are reconciled to Him, He will help us when all human help fails. Let us then 'seek first the kingdom of God:' let us be thankful for our daily bread, and not contract habits of self-indulgence, nor set our affections on earthly objects: and may the whole Word of God, being truly believed, combine to increase in us reverent fear and holy hope, that we may be 'steadfast and unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that our labor is not in vain in the Lord.' SCOTT.

Elisha lodged at Samaria at this time, probably in the school of the prophets, sharing the hardships of that city during the siege and famine; and the elders had resorted to him to entreat his prayers, or to desire his counsel.—Probably Jehoram meant (33), that he might as well put Elisha to death, and surrender to Ben-hadad without further delay. (Notes, 25. Job 2:9—11. Jer. 2:25. Lam. 3:26—30.)—As the messenger was excluded till the king arrived, it is evident that the latter was the speaker of these words, and not his servant in his presence. While the weightier matters of the law were generally neglected, and idolatry prevailed, the prescribed rule about the exclusion of lepers seems to have been rigorously observed. delity, he should see this great plenty for his conviction, yet not eat of it for his comfort. Note, Unbelief is a sin by which men greatly dishonor and displease God, and deprive themselves of the favors He designed for them; the murmuring Israelites saw Canaan, but could not enter in because of unbelief; such (says Bp. Patrick) will be the portion of those that believe not the promise of eternal life, they shall see it at a distance, Abraham afar off, but shall never taste of it; for they forfeit the benefit of the promise, if they cannot find in their heart to take God's word.

V. 3—11. We are here told,

I. How the siege of Samaria was raised just at twilight, v. 6, 7. The Syrians that besieged Dothan, had their sight imposed on; (ch. 6: 18.) these their hearing; God knows how to work on every sense, pursuant to his own counsels, Ex. 4: 11. Whether the noise was really in the air, by the ministry of angels, or only a sound in their ears, is not certain; God both brings the wind out of his treasures, and formeth the spirit of man within him. The sight of horses and chariots had encouraged the prophet's servant, (ch. 6: 17.) but now the noise of them terrified the hosts of Syria; notices from the invisible world are either very comfortable, or very dreadful, according as men are at peace with God, or at war with Him.

1. Hearing this noise, they concluded the king of Israel had procured assistance from some foreign power. There was, for aught we know, but one king of Egypt, and what kings there were of the Hittites nobody can imagine; but they imposed on themselves. Had they supposed it the king of Judah with his forces, it had been more probable; but even this fancy, their reason might soon have set aside: how could the king of Israel, who was closely besieged, hold intelligence with those distant princes? What had he to hire them with? It was impossible but some notice would come, before, of the motions of so great an host; but there were they in great fear, where no fear was.

2. Hereupon they all fled, v. 7. their horses might have hastened their flight, but they could not stay to take them, v. 7. None of them had

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. In extreme distress unexpected relief is often preparing: and, whatever unbelievers may imagine, it is not in vain to wait for the Lord, how long soever He seems to delay his coming.—We are all prone to judge of God's promises by human probabilities, and to limit his power of performance by our capacity of discerning how it can be done; and whatever increases pride and self-confidence proportionably augments this [tendency.] But all those, who persist in despising either his promised blessings, or this method of obtaining them, will see the felicity of believers without partaking of it. For, though God will pardon the infirmities of his people's faith, while they pray, 'Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief;' yet He will not spare those, who harden themselves and others in rebellion, through their infidel objections and enmity against the truth, however they may enjoy the confidence of earthly princes, or the admiration of mankind.—Men reason justly in their secular concerns; yet, in the concerns of their souls, they will not be so convinced, even by demonstration, as to bestow pains, and put themselves to inconveniences, to escape the wrath to come, and obtain eternal life. But the awakened sinner fears an evil infinitely worse than death; and under the greatest discouragements, even when tempted to despair, he learns to argue, 'If I go on in sin, or sit down in sloth, or run into worldly dissipation, or have recourse to superstitions, or attempt to establish my own righteousness, I must perish. The mercy of God in Jesus Christ is my only refuge. If I cast myself at his feet and wait his time, who knows but He may save me? And if at last He spurns me, I can but be lost. All else is comparatively worthless: if then I must perish, I will perish under the means of grace, and supplicating his mercy and salvation.' (Esth. 4: 16.) In like manner the believer, exposed to the terrors of persecution, reasons with himself: 'If I am faithful to the Lord, I can but die, and He will give me the crown of life: but if I deny Christ, through dread of death, He will refuse to acknowledge me another day: and I 'fear Him who is able to destroy body and soul in hell,' more than those, 'who can only kill the body.' Thus believers venture themselves into the Savior's hands, and cleave to Him with purpose of heart; whilst others neglect or forsake him. SCOTT.

they shamelessly neglected his command concerning idolatry! Thus men are wont to observe diligently those commands which are more easy, and can be discharged compendiously, or in the lump as it were; but will despise the more difficult.' PETER MARTYR.

Verses 6, 7.

The infatuation, which seized the minds of the whole Syrian army, was equal to the illusion put on their senses. The excessive terror must have been caused immediately by supernatural influence on their minds. (M. R.—19:7. Ex. 15:14—16. Deut. 2:24, 25. 1 Sam. 14:11—15.) SCOTT.

(6.) Kings of the Egyptians.] So the ancient versions, except the Syr. which has king. Boothr. thinks kings an error of the transcriber for king. ED.

Some suppose these were contemporary kings, reigning in upper and lower Egypt respectively. Or were they military chieftains of nomes, or is the Heb. a copyist's error? This siege Hales places between 895 and 905 B. C. Usher between 885 and 892. Hales, in his dynasties of the Egyptian kings, makes 'a chasm here [as regards the names of the Egyptian kings] of 151 yrs. from B. C. 815 to 966;' and 'after the death of Sethon, a short interregnum of 2 yrs. prevailed, according to Diod.; when the Egyptians elected 12 kings, who united at Memphis and reigned 15 yrs. one for every nome or district.' This he thinks to be prophesied Is. 19:2. where 'kingdom against kingdom' (Heb.) is transl. by the Sept. 'nomos epi nomon.' Wilkinson gives the following list between these last periods. 'Osorthon (of Manetho, &c. Osorkon 1 of the hierogl. Zerah (the Ethiopian) who battled with Asa, 2 Chr. 14: 941 B. C. ascended the throne at Shishak's death (2 Chr. 12:9.) in 945. Tacellothis, (of Man. &c. Takelothe of hierog.) succeeded him in 925. With him ended the 22d. dynasty (Diospolitan). Osorkon 2. (hierogl.) 1st k. of the 23d. Diosp. dyn. succeeded him in 908. Sheshonk 2. (hierogl.) succeeded in 890, and reigned to about 860. To him succeeded 'other kings (?)' hierogl. It does not appear whether Tnephactus was in this or the succeeding dynasty (Saïte) which commenced with Bocchoris ('the wise,' son of Tnephactus, Asychis of Herod. (?) Peher Bakhor, or Amunse Pehor) in 812. According to Diod. a long time intervened between Bocchoris and Sabaco (the So of Scripture [2 K. 17:4. note], Sabakoftep or Sabakoph of hierogl.) who, as first of the 25th. Dyn. (Ethiopian) ascended the throne 778 B. C. (he was succeeded in 728 by Sebechon or Sevechus, his son, hierogl. Shebek) who was succeeded in 714 by Teraces or Tearchus (hierogl. Tehrak), Tearchon of Strabo, Tirhaka of SS. [2 K. 19:9. note.] This Teraces reigned till 690. The captivity of the 10 tribes happened in 721. I am not quite certain if Sabakoftep should be before or after Shebek. Herod. mentions Anysis expelled by Sabaco; and his Sethos was the contemporary of Tirhakah, and ruled at Memphis. According to Africanus, the 22d. Dyn. was of Bubastites and Tanites, but these 2 dyn. are also said to be both of Diospolitan kings. Stephinathis (of Manetho, &c.) was 1st of the 26th Dyn. (Saites,) then Nechepsus, and Nechao I. (Man. &c.) then Psammitichus (his son) Psamatik I. (hierogl.) who ascended the throne in 664. After the death of Sethos, it appears that the 12 chiefs seized the kingdom; but as Neco, the father of Psamaticus I. was put to death by Sabaco, it is probable that these 3 kings were contemporaries of the 25th Dyn. The 12 kings, or rather nomarchs, reigned (so Herod.) at this time. To Psamatik I. succeeded Nechao II. (hierogl. Neco) the Necho of SS, [2 Chr. 35:20. note,] who defeated and slew Josiah, in 610. To him succeeded Psammitichus, (Psammutis, Psammis, the Psamatik II. of the hierogl. in 604, who in 595 left the throne to Vaphres or Apries, (Psamatik III. of hierogl.) Pharaoh Hophra (?) of SS. [Jer. 44:30. note.] Amosis or Amasis, (Ames Neitse, hierogl.) next mounts the throne, in 570, and is succeeded by Psammicherites or Psammenites in 525; in which year Cambyses (Canbosh, hierogl.) conquers Egypt, and founds the 27th Dyn. (Persian).' WILKINSON ED.

9 Then [z] they said one to another, We do not well; [a] this day is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace: if we tarry till the morning-light, * some [b] mischief will come upon us: now therefore come, that we may go and tell the king's household.

10 So they came and called unto [c] the porter of the city: and they told him, saying, We came to the camp of the Syrians, and, behold, there was [d] no man there, neither voice of man, but horses tied, and asses tied, and the tents as they were.

11 And he called the porters; and they told it to the king's house within.

12 ¶ And the king arose in the night, and said [e] unto his servants, [f] I will now show you what the Syrians have done to us. They know [g] that we be hungry; therefore are they gone out of the camp to [h] hide themselves in the field, saying, When they come out of the city, we shall catch them alive, and get into the city.

15 And they went after them unto Jordan: and, lo, all the way was full of garments and [l] vessels, which the Syrians [m] had cast away in their haste. And the messengers returned and told the king.

16 And the people went out, and [n] spoiled the tents of the Syrians. So a measure of fine flour was sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, [o] according to the word of the LORD.

17 And the king appointed [p] the lord on whose hand he leaned, to have the charge of the gate: and [q] the people trode upon him in the gate, and he died, as the man of God had said, who spake when the king came down to him.

18 And it came to pass [r] as the man of God had spoken to the king, saying; Two measures of barley for a shekel, and a measure of fine flour for a shekel, shall be to-morrow about this time in the gate of Samaria:

19 And that lord answered the man of God, and said, Now, behold, if the LORD should make windows in heaven, might such a thing be. And he said, Behold, thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof.

CHAP. VIII.

The Shunammite, by Elisha's advice, to avoid a famine of seven years, goes to sojourn in Philistia, 1, 2. On her return, she applies to the king, who is conversing with Gehazi on Elisha's miracles; and he restores her land, 3—6. Elisha goes to Damascus: Hazael is sent by Ben-hadad to inquire of him concerning his sickness: he predicts Hazael's cruelty to Israel, as destined to be king of Syria, 7—13. Hazael murders Ben-hadad and succeeds him, 14, 15. Jehoram reigns wickedly in Judah, 16—19. Edom and Libnah revolt, 20—22. Jehoram is succeeded by Ahaziah, who reigns wickedly, 23—27. He assists the king of Israel against Syria, and when wounded visits him at Jezreel, 28, 29.

THEN spake Elisha unto the woman, [a] whose son he had restored to life, saying, Arise, and go thou and thine household, and [b] sojourn wheresoever thou canst sojourn: for [c] the LORD hath [d] called for a famine; and it shall also come upon the land [e] seven years.

2 And the woman arose, and did after the saying of the man of God: and she went [f] with her household, and sojourned in [g] the land of the Philistines seven years.

B. C. 885. 3 And it came to pass at the seven years' end, that the woman returned out of the land of the Philistines: and [h] she went forth to cry unto the king for her house and for her land.

4 And the king talked with [i] Gehazi the servant of the man of God, saying, [k] Tell me, I pray thee, [l] all the great things that Elisha hath done.

5 And it came to pass, as he was telling the king how [m] he had restored a dead body to life, that, [n] behold, the woman, whose son he had restored to life, cried to the king for her house and for her land. And Gehazi said, [o] My lord, O king, this is the woman, and this is her son, whom Elisha restored to life.

6 And when the king asked the woman, she told him. So the king appointed unto her a certain * officer, saying, [p] Restore all that was hers, and all the fruits of the field since the day that she left the land, even until now.

7 ¶ And Elisha came to [q] Damascus; and [r] Ben-hadad the king of Syria was sick; and it was told him, saying, The man of God is come hither.

8 And the king said unto Hazael, Take a present in thine hand, and go, meet the man of God, and inquire of the LORD by him, saying, Shall I recover of this disease?

9 So Hazael went to meet him, and took a present with him, even of every good thing of Damascus, forty camels' burden, and came and stood before him, and said, Thy son Ben-hadad king of Syria hath sent me to thee, saying, Shall I recover of this disease?

10 And Elisha said unto him, Go, say unto him, Thou mayest certainly recover: howbeit the LORD hath shewed me that he shall surely die.

11 And he settled his countenance steadfastly, until he was ashamed: and the man of God wept.

12 And Hazael said, Why weepeth my lord? And he answered, Because I know the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel: their strong holds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child.

13 And Hazael said, But what, is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing? And Elisha answered, The LORD hath shewed me that thou shalt be king over Syria.

14 So he departed from Elisha, and came to his master; who said to him, What said Elisha to thee? And he answered, He told me that thou shouldest surely recover.

15 And it came to pass on the morrow, that he took a thick cloth, and dipped it in water, and spread it on his face, so that he died: and Hazael reigned in his stead.

16 ¶ And in the fifth year of Joram the son of Ahab king of Israel, Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah began to reign.

17 Thirty and two years old was he when he began to reign, and reigned eight years in Jerusalem.

18 And he walked in the way of the kings of Israel, as did the house of Ahab: for the daughter of Ahab was his wife: and he did evil in the sight of the LORD.

19 Yet the LORD would not destroy Judah for David his servant's sake, as he promised him to give unto him always a light, and to his children.

20 In his days Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah, and made a king over themselves.

21 So Joram went over to Zair, and all the chariots with him: and he rose by night, and smote the Edomites which compassed him about, and the captains of the chariots: and the people fled into their tents.

22 Yet Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah unto this day. Then Libnah revolted at the same time.

23 And the rest of the acts of Joram, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?

24 And Joram slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David: and Ahaziah his son reigned in his stead.

25 ¶ In the twelfth year of Joram the son of Ahab king of Israel did Ahaziah the son of Jehoram king of Judah begin to reign.

26 Two and twenty years old was Ahaziah when he began to reign, and he reigned one year in Jerusalem. His mother's name also was Athaliah, the daughter of Omri king of Israel.

27 And he walked in the way of the house of Ahab, and did evil in the sight of the LORD, as did the house of Ahab: for he was the son in law of the house of Ahab.

28 And he went with Joram the son of Ahab to the war against Hazael king of Syria in Ramoth-gilead; and the Syrians wounded Joram.

29 And king Joram went back to be healed in Jezreel of the wounds which the Syrians had given him at Ramah, when he fought against Hazael king of Syria. And Ahaziah the son of Jehoram king of Judah went down to see Joram the son of Ahab in Jezreel, because he was sick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9—20. Natural [benevolence and fear] are powerful checks on the selfishness of the ungodly, and tend to preserve some order and regularity in the world. Those, however, who have found 'the unsearchable riches of Christ,' will not delay to report the good tidings to others, that they may partake of that blessedness, which is sufficient for all: and from love to Him they will gladly communicate their temporal good things to their brethren.—True faith consists with prudent precautions: but unbelief suggests endless and unreasonable suspicions, and puts away those blessings, which are brought nigh to the soul, by the invitations and promises of God. The believer, on the other hand, makes trial of them, and experience confirms his faith: and a change, immensely more felicitating than that which is here recorded, takes place in his state, prospects, comforts, and character. May God help us seriously to inquire, whether we are now exposed to his awful threatenings, or interested in his exceedingly great and precious promises; that so we may profit by the warning, or by the encouragement, resulting from that knowledge of our own state and character, compared with the warnings, and promises of the holy Scriptures. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. This famine seems to have been sent in the latter part of Jehoram's reign, as a punishment of the pertinacious idolatry of both king and people, notwithstanding the miracles which they had witnessed, and the mercies which they had experienced. (Am. 7:4.)—Had not Judah also felt the effects of the famine, it is likely that this pious woman would have gone thither to sojourn. SCOTT.

Verses 7, 8.

The prophet doubtless was divinely directed to go to Damascus. Some suppose he retired thither during the famine.—Ben-hadad was was told him, saying, [s]The man of God [t]is come hither.

8 And the king said unto Hazael, [u]Take a present in thine hand, and go, meet the man of God, and [x]inquire of the LORD by him, saying, Shall I recover of this disease?

9 So [y]Hazael went to meet him, and took a present * with him, even of every good thing of Damascus, forty camels' burden, and came and stood before him, and said, [z]Thy son Ben-hadad king of Syria hath sent me to thee, saying, Shall I recover of this disease?

10 And Elisha said unto him, Go, say unto him, Thou mayest certainly recover: howbeit [b]the LORD hath showed me that [c]he shall surely die.

11 And he settled his countenance † steadfastly, until he was ashamed: and the man of God [d]wept.

12 And Hazael said, Why weepeth [e]my lord? And he answered, Because I know [f]the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel: their strongholds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt [g]dash their children, and rip up their women with child.

13 And Hazael said, But what, is thy servant [h]a dog, that [i]he should do this great thing? And Elisha answered, [k]The LORD hath showed me that thou shalt be king over Syria.

14 So he departed from Elisha, and came to his master; who said to him, What said Elisha to thee? And he answered, [l]He told me that thou shouldest surely recover.

15 And [m]it came to pass [n]on the morrow, that he took a thick cloth, and dipped it in water, and spread it on his face, [o]so that he died: and [p]Hazael reigned in his stead.

convert; the more needful now, because he seems out of his place. Hazael is supposed now to be captain of the host; either Naaman resigned, or was turned out, because he would not bow, or not bow heartily, in the house of Rimmon: some think he went to Damascus on account of the famine, or rather, in obedience to the orders God gave Elijah, (1 K. 19: 15.) Go to Damascus to anoint Hazael, thou, or thy successor.

II. We may wonder that the king of Syria, in sickness, should make Elisha his oracle. Notice was soon brought him, the man of God (by that title he was well known in Syria since he cured Naaman) was come to Damascus, v. 7. Never in better time, says Ben-hadad; now he is sick, he distrusts his idol, and sends to inquire of God. Affliction brings those to God, who, in prosperity, made light of Him; sometimes sickness opens men's eyes, and rectifies their mistakes. This is the more observable, 1. Because not long since a king of Israel had, in his sickness, sent to inquire of the god of Ekron, (ch. 1: 2.) as if there had been no God in Israel. Note, God sometimes fetches to Himself that honor from strangers, which is denied Him by his own professing people. 2. Because not long since this Ben-hadad had sent a great force to treat Elisha as an enemy, ch. 6: 14. Note, Among other instances of the change of men's minds by sickness and affliction, this is one, that it often gives them other thoughts of God's ministers, and teaches them to value the counsels and prayers of those whom they had hated and despised.

To honor the prophet, (1.) He sends to him, not for him, as if, with the centurion, he thought himself not worthy the man of God should come under his roof. (2.) He sends by Hazael, his prime minister, not by a common messenger. (3.) He sends a noble present, v. 6. testifying his affection to the prophet, bidding him welcome to Damascus, and providing for his sustenance while he sojourned there; it is probable Elisha accepted it, (why should he not?) [as God's provision for his sojourn, and for the poor, and poor prophets of Israel, says Scott.] (4.) He orders Hazael to call him his son Ben-hadad, conforming to the language of Israel, who called the prophets fathers. Lastly, He honored him as one acquainted with the secrets of Heaven, when he inquired, Shall I recover? It is natural to us, to desire to know things to come in time, while things to come in eternity are little thought of, or inquired after.

III. What passed between Hazael and Elisha, is especially remarkable. 1. Elisha answered, that the king might recover, the disease was not mortal, but that he should die another way, (v. 10.) not a natural, but a violent death. 2. He looked Hazael in the face with an unusual concern, till he made Hazael blush, and himself weep, v. 11. The man of God could outface the man of war. It was not in Hazael's countenance, that Elisha read what he would do, but revealed it to him: the more foresight men have, the more grief they are liable to. 3. When Hazael asked him why he wept, he told him what great mischief he foresaw he would do the Israel of God, v. 12. The sins of Israel provoked God to give them up into the hands of their cruel enemies, yet Elisha wept to think that ever Israelite should be thus abused; for though he foretold, he did not desire, the woful day. See what havoc war makes, what havoc sin makes, and how the nature of man is changed by the fall, and [become so depraved as to seem at times] stript even of humanity itself. 4. Hazael is greatly surprised at this prediction, v. 13. He looks upon it to be, an act of great power, not to be done but by a crowned head; (many are raised to that dominion they never thought of, and it often proves to their own hurt, Eccl. 8. 9.) —an act of great barbarity, which could not be done but by one lost to all honor and virtue. See here, (1.) What a bad opinion he had of the sin, looking upon it to be great wickedness, fitter for a brute, a beast of prey, than a man. Note, It is possible for a wicked man, under the convictions and restraints of a natural conscience, to express great abhorrence of a sin, and yet afterward be well reconciled to it. (2.) What a good opinion he had of himself, how much better than hitherto been faithful to us, and need the help of those on whom we have not heretofore had any dependence.—The love of worldly riches induces men to various methods of fraud and oppression, and breaks through the most powerful obligations, or the strongest relative ties. Hence the benefit of magistracy, to preserve equity and order among mankind. Believers may, on important occasions, avail themselves of their privileges as members of the community; provided they are not actuated by covetousness or resentment, do not manifest a contentious spirit, and make no appeal in a doubtful cause, or in matters of no great importance: (Matt. 5: 38—42.) and rulers should award justice without respect of persons, and compel the injurious to restitution.—But the Lord Himself will plead the cause of the defenceless and the oppressed, of the fatherless and the widow: He often effects his purpose, by influencing the hearts of princes in their favor; and the most casual or trivial incident, which conduces to it, may prove an occasion of exciting praise and gratitude for his providential goodness.

no longer disposed to injure Elisha. The report of the prophet's miracles had excited respect and veneration for him, and perhaps his sickness had softened his mind; so that he welcomed him to his capital, and, according to the custom of the day, sent his chief minister with presents of very great value, to inquire of him concerning his recovery. (1:2. 1 K. 14:1—4.) It would have been far more rational, to request the instruction and prayers of 'the man of God.'

Ben-hadad's disease was not of itself mortal, though his life was near its end from another cause. But the prophet either did not know, or did not think it proper to inform Hazael, what that cause would be.—The Hebrew text however is, 'Thou shalt not surely recover,' or live; 'for the LORD,' &c. though ancient expositors, both Jews and Christians, adopting the reading of the margin, render it as it stands in our version: and indeed this appears to be the true reading; as the prophet's answer was probably intended to be obscure and ambiguous.

Elisha's intimation might give Satan an occasion of suggesting this villany to Hazael; but it was not the cause of his crime, and formed no excuse for it. Had he been of David's disposition, he would have waited, in the path of duty, till the Lord had performed his word, in that manner which pleased Him. (1 Sam. 24:4—7. 1 K. 11:37. 12:2, 3, 26—29.) Thus he soon manifested the rapacity and cruelty of the dog, of which he desired to be thought incapable. (12, 13. Is. 56:9—12. Mic. 3:5—7.)—It is supposed, that Ben-hadad had no son; that 16 ¶ And in the fifth year of Joram the son of Ahab king of Israel, Jehoshaphat being then king of Judah, [q] Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah * began to reign.

17 Thirty and two years old was he when he began to reign; and he reigned eight years in Jerusalem.

18 And he walked [r] in the way of the kings of Israel, as did [s] the house of Ahab; for [t] the daughter of Ahab was [u] his wife: and he did evil in the sight of the LORD.

19 Yet the LORD would not destroy Judah [x] for David his servant's sake, as he promised him to give him alway a † light, and to his children.

20 In his days [y] Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah, and [z] made a king over themselves.

21 So Joram went over to Zair, and all the chariots with him; and he rose by night, and smote the Edomites which compassed him about and the captains of the chariots: and the people fled into their tents.

22 Yet [a] Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah unto this day. Then [b] Libnah revolted at the same time.

23 And [c] the rest of the acts of Joram, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?

24 And Joram [d] slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David: and * Ahaziah his son reigned in his stead.

25 ¶ In the [f] twelfth year of Joram the son of Ahab king of Israel he deserved. Note, We are apt to think ourselves sufficiently armed against those sins which yet we are afterward overcome by, as Peter, Matt. 26: 35. Lastly, In answer, Elisha only told him he should be king over Syria; then he would have power to do it, and then he would find in his heart to do it. Honors change men's tempers and manners, and seldom for the better. Those that are little and low in the world, cannot imagine how strong the temptations of power and prosperity are, which if ever they arrive at, they will find how deceitful their hearts were, and how much worse than they suspected.

IV. What Hazael did, hereupon; if he took any occasion to do it from what Elisha had said, the fault was in him, not in the word.

1. He basely cheated his master, and belied the prophet, v. 10, 14. He told me thou shouldest certainly recover: either because he was loath to put the king out of humor with bad news, or because hereby he might the more effectually carry that bloody design, which he conceived* when he was told he should be his successor.

2. He barbarously murdered his master, and so made good the prophet's word, v. 15. The cloth was laid on the king's face, under pretence of cooling and refreshing him, but so that it stopped his breath, and stifled him, he being weak, (and not able to help himself,) or perhaps asleep, such a bubble is the life of the greatest of men. Some think Hazael was not suspected, and that the murder was never known, but through the inspired historian. We found this haughty monarch (1 K. 20.) the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, but he goes down slain to the pit with his iniquity upon his bones, Ezek. 32: 25.

V. 16—24. We have here a brief account of the life and reign of Jehoram, (or Joram,) one of the worst of the kings of Judah, but the son and successor of Jehoshaphat, one of the best. Note, 1. Many that have themselves been godly,† have had the grief and shame of seeing their children wicked and vile; let not families, thus afflicted, think it strange. 2. If the children of good parents prove wicked, commonly they are worse than others. 3. A nation is sometimes justly punished with the miseries of a bad reign, for not improving the blessings and advantages of a good one.

Concerning this Jehoram, observe,

I. No mistake is more fatal to young people, than a mistake in the choice of their company, and the examples they would respect and follow; Jehoram chose the house of Ahab for his pattern (v. 18.) rather than his father's house, and it was his ruin. We have a particular account of his wickedness, 2 Chr. 21. murder, idolatry, persecution, every thing bad.

II. The occasions of his badness; his father did ill, to marry him to the daughter of Ahab; no good could come of an alliance with an idolatrous family, but all mischief with such a daughter of such a mother, as Athaliah the daughter of Jezebel: the degeneracy of the old world took rise from the unequal yoking of professors with profane; those that are ill-matched, are already half-ruined. I doubt he did not do well, to make him king in his own life-time, v. 16. hereby he gratified his pride, (than which nothing is more pernicious to young people,) in hopes to reform him by humoring him, and so brought a curse on his family, as Eli did, whose sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not. Jehoshaphat made him viceroy, once when he went with Ahab to Ramoth-gilead, from which Jehoshaphat's 17th year, (1 K. 22: 51.) is made Jehoram's second; (ch. 1: 17.) but afterward, in his 22d year, he made him partner in his government, thence Joram's 8 years are to be dated, 3 years before his father's death. It has been hurtful to many young men, to come too soon to their estates; Samuel got nothing by making his sons judges.

III. The rebukes of Providence he was under for his badness. 1. The Edomites revolted, who had been under the government of the kings of Judah ever since David's time, about 150 years, v. 20. He attempted to reduce them, and gave them a defeat, (v. 21.) but could not improve it so as to recover his dominion; yet again Edom revolted; (v. 22.) and the Edomites were, after this, bitter enemies to the Jews, as appears by the prophecy of Obadiah, and Ps. 137: 7. Now Isaac's prophecy was fulfilled, that this Esau the elder should serve Jacob the younger; yet in process of time, he should break that yoke from off his neck, Gen. 27: 40. 2. Libnah revolted, a city in Judah, in the heart of his country, a priests' city: they shook off his government, because he had forsaken God, and would have compelled them to do so too, 2 Chr. 21: 10, 11.

IV. The gracious care of Providence for keeping up the kingdom of Judah, and the house of David, notwithstanding the apostasies and calamities of Jehoram's reign, v. 19. for David's sake; not for any merit, but for the sake of a promise made him, that he should always have a lamp, i. e. a succession of kings from one generation to another; by which his name should be kept bright and illustrious, as a lamp is kept burning by a constant fresh supply of oil, the Lord would not destroy Judah: thus his family was not to be extinct, till it terminated in the Messiah, that son of David, on whom was to be hung all the glory of his father's house, and in whose everlasting kingdom that promise to David is fulfilled, I have ordained a lamp for mine anointed.

V. The conclusion of this impious and inglorious reign, v. 23, 24. Nothing peculiar is here said of him; but we are told, 2 Chr. 21: 19, 20. that he died of sore diseases, and died without being desired.

V. 25—29. As, among common persons, there are some we call little men, who make no figure, are little regarded, and less valued; so among kings, some, in comparison with others, we may call little kings, as this Ahaziah; he looks mean in the history, and, because wicked, in God's account, vile. It is too plain an evidence of the affinity between Jehoshaphat and Ahab, that they had the same names in their families, at the same

---

* As he was able to put it in execution so soon, it seems more probable that this design had long been conceived, (comp. v. 11.) and every thing got ready: so his language, (v. 13.) will be that of hypocrisy: and the prophecy thus became but one more temptation. Ed.

† We know not if Jehoram's mother was godly; and the proper education of children requires the exercise of other virtues than are commonly included under the term godliness: another character than that of merely passive goodness. Note, Prov. 22: 6. Ed.

Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, began to reign with his father before the death of Ahab, so that Ahaziah the son of Ahab died in the 2nd year of his reign, or in the 18th of Jehoshaphat. About 5 years after he seems to have been more solemnly admitted to the exercise of the royal authority, within 2 years of his father's death. This took place when Jehoram was 32 years old, and from that time he reigned 8 years; though he reigned only 5 or 6, as sole king after the death of his father. (1:17.) ID.

CHAP. IX.

A young prophet, by Elisha's orders, goes to Ramoth-gilead; anoints Jehu as king over Israel, and directs him to extirpate Ahab's family, 1—10. Jehu acquaints the captains, is proclaimed king, and marches in haste to Jezreel against Joram, 11—16. Joram sends messengers to Jehu, who detains them, 17—20. He and Ahaziah meet Jehu, who kills Joram, and casts him into the field of Naboth, 21—26. Ahaziah is slain at Gur, and buried at Jerusalem, 27—29. Jezebel, by Jehu's orders, is thrown out of the window, and trampled under foot, 30—33. She is eaten by dogs, as Elijah had predicted, 34—37.

AND Elisha the prophet called one of [r] the children of the prophets, and said unto him, [b] Gird up thy loins, and take this [c] box of oil in thine hand, and go to [d] Ramoth-gilead:

2 And when thou comest thither, look out there [e] Jehu, the son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi, and go in, and make him rise up from [f] among his brethren, and carry him to an ‖ inner chamber:

3 Then take the box of oil, and [s] pour it on his head, and say, Thus saith the LORD, [h] I have anointed thee king over Israel. Then open the time, in which, we may suppose, they designed to compliment one another. Ahab had two sons, Ahaziah and Jehoram, who reigned successively; Jehoshaphat had a son and grandson named Jehoram and Ahaziah, who, in like manner, reigned successively. If Ahab lent names to that wretched family, he could not communicate with them the devotion of their significations, Ahaziah, Taking hold of the Lord; and Jehoram, The Lord exalted.

Ahaziah king of Israel had reigned but two years, Ahaziah king of Judah but one. We are here told, his relation to Ahab's family was the occasion, 1. Of his wickedness, v. 27. his mother was Ahab's daughter, v. 26. The child may be expected to resemble the mother. When men choose wives for themselves, they must remember they are choosing mothers for their children, and are concerned to choose accordingly.*

2. Of his fall; Joram, his mother's brother, courted him to join him for the recovery of Ramoth-gilead, an attempt fatal to Ahab; so it was to Joram his son, for in that expedition he was wounded, (v. 28.) and returned to Jezreel to be cured, leaving his army there in possession of the place. Ahaziah was likewise returned, but went to Jezreel, to see how Jehoram did, v. 29. Providence so ordered it, that he who had been debauched by the house of Ahab, might be cut off with them, when the measure of their iniquity was full, as we shall find in the next ch.

* Spurzheim remarks, that 'men have seldom become great, who were not the offspring of well-gifted mothers.' If any one doubted the expediency of regarding God's 'laws of hereditary descent,' one would think the history of the children of David's, Solomon's, or Ahab's wives would convince him. See Buchan and Spurzheim. Ed.

CHAP. IX. Hazael and Jehu were designed to be the instruments of God's justice, in punishing and destroying the house of Ahab. Elijah was bidden to appoint them to this service; but, on Ahab's humiliation, a reprieve was granted, and so it was left to Elisha to appoint them. Hazael's elevation to the throne of Syria we read of in the foregoing ch.; and we must now attend Jehu to the throne of Israel; for him that escapeth the sword of Hazael, as Joram and Ahaziah did, Jehu must slay, of which this ch. gives us an account.

V. 1—10. Jehu was, at this time, a commander (probably, in-chief) of the forces employed at Ramoth-gilead, v. 14. there fighting for the king his master. It does not appear he aimed at the government, or ever thought of it; the commission was a perfect surprise to him. Some think he had been anointed before by Elijah, but privately, and with an intimation not to act till further orders, as Samuel anointed David long before he was to come to the throne; but that is not at all probable, for then we must suppose Elijah had anointed Hazael too. No, when God bade him do these things, He bade him anoint Elisha to be prophet in his room, to do them when he was gone, as God should direct him.

I. The commission sent. Elisha did not go himself to anoint Jehu, because he was old, and unfit for such a journey, and so well known, that he could not do it privately, or without observa-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7—29. The Lord can procure his people a welcome, and spread them a table, even amidst their enemies; who, on some occasions, and especially in affliction, may be inclined to show them great kindness and respect. Yet few, even in that case, derive real benefit from their instructions, and disposition to do them good: but some honor redounds to God, and outward advantages accrue to his servants; who may without scruple receive them, as from Him, when they are not required to flatter, or in any other way to act inconsistently with their profession.—Those who love God and man must often weep, upon a survey of the wickedness and misery of mankind: and a particular foresight of the state of the church, and of the world, would augment their sorrow. Little are men aware, when not exposed to temptation, of the desperate wickedness of their own hearts! [for all have the same natural propensities, though in different degrees.] Those who, as mortified limbs, are continually cut off from the body politic, once no more thought of such criminality and condemnation, than any reader of these observations: and we are many of us capable, if left to ourselves, of the worst crimes perpetrated by the vilest pests and scourges of the world! This should remind us, 'not to be high-minded but to fear,' and to trust only in the Lord to preserve us from the deceitfulness of our own hearts. As the desire of greatness is a dangerous temptation, which has induced many to perpetrate the basest crimes, we ought to be content and thankful in more obscure situations; and those, who are called to this dangerous pre-eminence, have need of double watchfulness and fervency in prayer.—When iniquity is conceived in the heart, means will be devised for its perpetration: and flattering language often cloaks the most malignant purposes: for sinners in general are satisfied with concealing their crimes from man, regardless of the all-seeing eye of God.—It is, in every case, an awful cruelty to flatter those with the hope of life, whom we suppose to be near dissolution: because they ought to be preparing for that important change, and to be counselled and warned so to employ their few remaining days or hours. When men choose wives for themselves, or take any measures in the marriage of their children, they should remember that their remote posterity are concerned, and that an improper choice may entail misery and ruin upon them. tion; therefore he sends one of the sons of the prophets to do it, v. 1. They not only reverenced him as their father, (ch. 2: 15.) but observed and obeyed him as such. The service was hazardous, (1 Sam. 16: 2.) and Elisha must not expose himself. It required labor, therefore was fitter for a young man. Let youth work, and age direct. Yet it was honorable, and he that did it might hope to be preferred; therefore, for the encouragement of the young prophets, Elisha employed one of them: he would not engross all the honors to himself.

When he sent him, 1. He put the oil into his hand, with which to anoint Jehu. Solomon was anointed with oil out of the tabernacle, 1 K. 1: 39. that could not now be had, but oil from a prophet's hand was equivalent. It was not the constant practice to anoint kings, but on the disturbance of the succession, as in the case of Solomon; or the interruption of it, as in the case of Joash; (ch. 11: 12.) or the translation of the government to a new family, as here, and in the case of David; yet it might be used generally, though the Scripture does not mention it. 2. He put the words into his mouth which he must say, (v. 3.) I have anointed thee king, no doubt, he told him all the rest he said, v. 7—10. Those whom God sends on his errand, shall not go without full instructions.

He also ordered him to do it, 1. Privately, (v. 2.) that Jehu's confidence in his commission might be tried, when he had no witness to attest it; his being, of a sudden, animated for the service, would be proof sufficient of his being anointed to it. The thing signified was the best evidence of the sign. 2. Expeditiously; when he went about it, he must gird up his loins; when he had done it, he must flee, and not tarry for a fee, or a treat, or to see what Jehu would do. It becomes the sons of the prophets to be quick and lively at their work, as men that hate sauntering and trifling. They should be as angels that fly swiftly.

II. The commission delivered, with despatch, v. 4. He found the general officers sitting together, either at dinner, or in a council of war, v. 5. and, with the assurance that became a messenger from God, notwithstanding the meanness of his appearance, he called Jehu out, not waiting his leisure, or begging pardon for disturbing him, but as one having authority. Perhaps Jehu had some intimation of his business; therefore, that he might not seem too forward to catch at the honor, he asked, To which of all us? That it might not be said afterward, he got it by speaking first, but they might all be satisfied he was indeed the person designed.

When the prophet had him alone, he anointed him, v. 6. The anointing of the Spirit is a hidden thing, that new name, which none knows but they that have it. Herewith,

I. He invests him with the royal dignity, gives him an incontestable title, but reminds him he was made king, (1.) By the God of Israel; from Him he must see his power derived, for Him he must use it, and to Him he must be accountable. Magistrates are the ministers of God, and must therefore act in dependence on Him, and with entire devotedness to Him and to his glory. (2.) Over the Israel of God; though the people of Israel were wretchedly corrupted, and had forfeited all the honor of relation to God, yet they are here called the people of the Lord, for He had a right to them, and had not yet given them a bill of divorce. Jehu must look on the people, as the people of the Lord, not as his vassals, but God's freemen, not to be abused or tyrannized over; God's people, and therefore to be ruled for Him, and according to his laws.

2. He instructs him in his present service, which was to destroy all the guilty house of Ahab; (v. 7.) not to clear his own way to the throne, and secure the possession of it, but to execute the judgments of God. He calls Ahab his master, that the relation might be no objection. 'Thou art under higher obligations to thy Master in heaven, than to thy master Ahab.'

That he might, intelligently, and in a right manner, do this great execution, he tells him,

(1.) Their crime, the ground of the controversy God had with them; that he might have an eye to that which God had an eye to, the blood of God's servants the prophets. Nothing fills the measure of the iniquity of any prince or people so as this, or brings surer and sorer ruin. This sin brought on Jerusalem its first destruction, (2 Chr. 36 : 16.) and its final one. Matt. 23: 37, 38. Jezebel's whoredoms and witchcrafts were not so provoking as her persecuting the prophets, killing some, and driving the rest into corners and caves, 1 K. 18: 4.

(2.) Their doom; they were sentenced to utter destruction; v. 8, 9, 10. The whole stock of royal blood was little enough, and too little, to atone for that of the prophets, saints and martyrs, which, in God's account, is of great price.

V. 11—15. 1. With what contempt the captains speak of the young prophet, v. 11. They call him a mad fellow, Hos. 9: 7. Note, Those that have no religion, commonly speak with disdain of those that are religious, and look upon them as mad. They said of our Savior, He is beside Himself; of John Baptist, He has a devil, is a poor, melancholy man; of Paul, Much learning has made thee mad. The highest wisdom is thus represented as folly, and those that best understand themselves, are looked upon as beside themselves. Perhaps Jehu intended it for a rebuke to his friends; 'Ye know the man to be a prophet, and the way of his communication to be not from madness, but inspiration.' Or, 'Being a prophet, you may guess his business, to tell me my faults, and teach me my duty: I need not inform you.' Thus he thought to have put them off, but they urged him. 'It is false, we cannot conjecture his errand, therefore tell us.' Thus pressed, he told them; probably, showed them the oil on his head, v. 12. He knew not but some of them might oppose him, and go near to crush his interest in its infancy; but he relied on the divine appointment, and feared not to own it, knowing whom he had trusted:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. The long-suffering of God enhances the condemnation of those, who are not led by it to repentance. (Rom. 2:4—6. 9:22,23.)—In his appointed time, He will raise up and qualify suitable instruments for performing his purpose, whether of vengeance or of mercy.—As the written Word is at present our only rule of duty, it seldom happens, that we are required to act, even in apparent violation of our relative obligations to princes, parents, masters, or other superiors; except in professing those truths, and attending on those ordinances, which they may disapprove, or prohibit; or in keeping aloof from those superstitious, or worldly practices, they would enjoin.—They, who are employed as ministers, will be the most exposed in these respects: for the message of the Lord, meeting sinners in the midst of their worldly pursuits, singles them out, by an application to their hearts and consciences, as if they were addressed by name: (2 Sam. 12:7.) and while some are thus separated from their companions, and, by the unction of the Holy Spirit, prepared for the service of God; others are marked out, in the midst of their prosperity, as in danger of eternal misery. Whilst, however, we conscientiously adhere to our instructions, we shall be accepted, and preserved as long as is really good for us. SCOTT.

I. Joram's watchman discovers him, first at a distance, whether friend or foe he cannot tell. The king, impatient to know, and perhaps jealous the Syrians were coming to seize him, sent first one messenger, and then another, for intelligence, v. 17—19. Scarcely recovered from the fright of the battle, his guilty conscience put him into continual terror. Each messenger asked the same question, 'Are you for us, or for our adversaries?' Each had the same answer, v. 18, 19. 'It is not to thee, but to him that sent thee, I will answer; for thy part, if thou wouldst consult thine own safety, turn thee behind me, and enlist among my followers.' The watchman, at length, observes the leader drove like Jehu, noted for driving furiously, and thereby discovering himself to be a man of a hot, eager spirit, intent on his business, and pushing forward with all his might. The wisdom of God is seen in the choice of proper instruments in his work. But it is not much for any man's reputation, to be known by his fury. He that has rule over his own spirit, is better than the mighty. The Chaldee paraphrase gives this a contrary sense: The leading is like that of Jehu, for he leads quietly. And, it should seem, he did not come up very fast, for then there had not been time for all that passed. Some think he chose to march slowly, that he might give Joram time to come out to him, and so despatch him before he entered the city.

II. Joram and Ahaziah go out to meet him; neither equipped for war, as not expecting an enemy, but in haste to satisfy their curiosity. How strangely has Providence sometimes ordered it, might be had to those vehement actions, which the prophets sometimes used, when influenced by the Spirit of prophecy: (1 Sam. 19:19—24.) Those, who have faithfully delivered the Lord's message to sinners, have in all ages been treated as madmen. (M. R. v.) They are so indifferent about those objects, which attract the senses, and which man naturally desires and pursues; and so engaged about those things which are invisible, and therefore generally neglected as if unreal; their judgment, conversation, maxims, and conduct are so contrary to those of other men; and they venture and endure so much, in pursuit of interests and objects of which others have no conception; that worldly men naturally conclude them to be mad, when they deem them honestly in earnest. (Mark 3:20, 21. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) The charge however is often brought in self-defence: for, admitting the principles and practice of the devoted servants of God to be reasonable, wise, and necessary to happiness, the inference is undeniable; that the ambitious, the sensual, the covetous, the dissipated, the worldly, and the ungodly of every description, are fools and madmen to all intents and purposes. SCOTT

It is probable this was done on the top of some edifice, from which the people were generally informed of such public transactions, as were proper to be communicated to them. 'The Chaldee, the rabbins, and several interpreters, understand this of the public sun-dial; which, in those ancient times, was formed of steps, like stairs, each step serving to indicate, by its shadow, one hour, or such division of time as was commonly used in that country. This was in the most public place; and on the platform upon its top Jehu was probably seated.' Dr. A. Clarke. This coronation took place in Ramoth-Gilead, otherwise called Ramoth-mizpeh, and seems to describe a ceremony uncommon except E. of the Jordan, perhaps confined to nomadic and hunting tribes. Here then we have 'a conspicuous place,' (Ramoth) 'a heap of witness,' (Gilead) 'a watch tower,' (Mizpeh,) and probably, 'a pillar,' (11:14.) an ascent (hamaâloth) or place of ascent, by steps or a winding way, and the Tigurine version has, ad tumulum, quo ascenderet, whence we may conjecture, in the absence of knowledge, that possibly this coronation took place upon one of those mounds described and figured, Gen. 31:44—48, &c. which seem among many nations to have answered the manifold purpose of fortresses, places of assemblies (of different tribes), religious and political, and politico-religious, burying places, and watch-towers. But Poole thinks, that the text implies simply, they made Jehu a hasty throne on the very steps of the building where the council assembled, without waiting to get to the level ground: and indeed ancient public buildings often had these conspicuous steps, witness the temple-palace at Persepolis, and comp. 1 K. 10:5. 1. The place where Joram met Jehu, was ominous, in the portion of Naboth the Jezreelite, v. 21. The very sight of that ground was enough to make Joram tremble, and Jehu triumph; for Joram had the guilt of Naboth's blood fighting against him, and Jehu the force of Elijah's curse fighting for him. The circumstances of events are sometimes so ordered by Divine Providence, as to make the punishment answer to the sin.

2. Joram's demand was still the same, 'Is all well?' It seems, he looked for peace, and could not entertain any other thought. Note, It is very common for great sinners, even when on the brink of ruin, to flatter themselves with an opinion that all is well with them, and to cry peace to themselves.

3. Jehu's reply was very startling, v. 22. See how plainly he deals with him. Formerly, he durst not do so, but now he had another spirit. Note, Sinners will not always be flattered, Ps. 36: 2. Observe, He charges on him his mother's wickedness, and, on that account, throws him off from all pretensions to peace; 'What peace can come to that house in which there is so much wickedness unrepented of?' Note, The way of sin can never be the way of peace, Isa. 57: 21. What peace can sinners have with God, what peace with their own consciences, what good, what comfort, can they expect in life, in death, or after death, who go on still in their trespasses? No peace so long as sin is persisted in; but as soon as it is repented of and forsaken, there is peace.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11—29. Every man should well consider, to what work the Lord calls him, and in what manner and for what ends he ought to do it. His special commission justifies the severest executions of his enemies; but our general instructions to do good, and to bless, and to overcome evil with good, point out to us more delightful services, in which we should thankfully abound from day to day.—The Lord often secretly disposes men to concur in his designs, in a manner contrary to their former conduct, and to all human probabilities: and then such events, as would otherwise have been impracticable, are speedily and easily accomplished: and, to ask advice, is often the readiest way of obtaining concurrence and assistance.—Notorious sinners entail judgment on their posterity unto the third and fourth generation, especially when these walk in the steps of their progenitors.—The circumstances of temporal judgment are, sometimes, remarkably calculated to call to remembrance the crimes for which they are inflicted: so that the most superficial observers must perceive the justice of God in them, and acknowledge that the Scriptures are fulfilled. Verse 22.

Idolatry is in scripture called whoredom; and, when committed by the professed people of God, adultery, to denote the Lord's abhorrence of it. Jezebel's idolatries had been manifold and long continued; and, as some think, attended by prostitution, according to the shameless practices of the Gentiles in their worship: of Jezebel's personal character in this respect nothing further is recorded. (Rev. 2: 20—23. 14:8. 17:1, 2.) The words, witchcrafts, may allude to the fascinating artifices that harlots use to allure men to wickedness, by which her various methods of seducing the Israelites to idolatry seem to be intended. For this purpose she doubtless employed promises, presents, caresses, and flatteries; and on the other hand, frowns, threats, and persecutions; by which great multitudes were induced to conform to her religion, and join in her spiritual whoredom. [The phrase comprehends every deception and abuse, practised, by philtres, or love-potions, medicaments, drugs, and poisons. Hewlett.] As Jehu had been long unsuspected, in the court of Ahab and his sons, he probably had never before in any way protested against the worship of Baal.—Jehoram was answerable for Jezebel's crimes, because he countenanced and imitated them, instead of using his authority to repress them. Verse 24.

Drew a bow with his full strength.] Two methods of shooting with the bow are depicted on ancient Egyptian monuments. In one, the left hand (having a guard, on the wrist, and a groove, for the arrow to slide in, on the fore-finger) grasps the bow, which is held vertically; the end of the arrow is held upon the string, between the thumb and fore-finger of the right hand, and the string is thus drawn to the right ear. This appears to be the method described in the text: in which our version follows the Arabic alone. In another method, depicted as above, the end of the arrow is placed between the first two fingers of the right hand, upon the string, and thus drawn to the breast only; (the Indians of N. America still use both of these methods;) and a third in which the bow is held horizontally. A cut is given from Hyde, at Isa. 13: 17, 18. of a darik, on which is stamped the figure of a Persian king, who has just discharged a bow with his full strength. ED.

Ahaziah was Ahab's grandson by Athaliah; and being also an idolater, he was within Jehu's commission. So that, being found with Jehoram, he shared his punishment; though, as son to pious Jehoshaphat, he was allowed an honorable burial. The circumstances elsewhere recorded concerning his death, render it probable, that he was not slain, till Jehu had inflicted vengeance on Jezebel at Jezreel. (30—37. 2 Chr. 22:7—9.) SCOTT.

Garden-house. (27) It seems, Ahab, notwithstanding Elijah's awful message to him, and his external humiliation, proceeded with his plan of forming Naboth's vineyard, or part of it, into a garden of herbs; and this house is supposed to have been built on it, for the accommodation of those who kept it. (1 K. 21:1, 2, 27—29.)—Died there.] Ahaziah was taken at Megiddo, and brought to Jehu, who slew him, probably at Jezreel. But he died with the others of the house of Ahab, which is supposed to be here meant. ID.

Verse 29.

Jehoram began to reign over Judah, in the 5th year of Jehoram king

30 ¶ And when Jehu was come to Jezreel, [*] Jezebel heard of it, and she [*] painted her face, and [f] tired her head, and looked out at a window.

31 And as Jehu entered in at the gate, she said, Had [g] Zimri [h] peace, who slew his master?

32 And he lifted up his face to the window, and said, [i] Who is on my side? who? And there looked out to him two or three † eunuchs.

33 And he said, [k] Throw her down. So they threw her down: and some of her blood was sprinkled on the wall, and on the horses; [l] and he trode her under foot.

34 And when he was come in, [m] he did eat and drink, and said, Go, see now [n] this cursed woman, and bury her: for [o] she is a king's daughter.

35 And they went to bury her: [p] but they found no more of her than the skull, and the feet, and the palms of her hands.

36 Wherefore they came again, and told him. And he said [q] This is the word of the LORD, which he spake ‡ by his servant Elijah the Tishbite, saying, In the portion of Jezreel shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel:

37 And [r] the carcass of Jezebel shall be as dung upon the face of the field in the portion of Jezreel; so that they shall not say, This is Jezebel.

[Practical Observations.]

long-threatened day of reckoning was now come, and cried out, 'There is treachery, O Ahaziah; Jehu is our enemy, and it is time for us to shift for our safety.' Both fled, and,

(1.) Joram king of Israel was slain presently, v. 24. It was one of God's arrows which He has ordained against the persecutor, Ps. 7: 13. Joram died a criminal, under sentence of the law, which Jehu, the executioner, pursues in the disposal of the dead body. Naboth's vineyard was hard by; this put him in mind of the doom Elijah passed on Ahab, v. 25, 26. and that very piece of ground which he, with so much pride and pleasure, had made himself master of, at the expense of the guilt of innocent blood, now became the theatre on which his son's dead body lay exposed, a spectacle to the world. The Lord is known by the judgment He executeth. Higgaion. Selah.

(2.) Ahaziah was pursued, and soon slain not far off, v. 27, 28. Though now in Joram's company, he had not been slain, but that he was joined with the house of Ahab both in affinity and in iniquity; he was one of them; so he had made himself by his sins, therefore he must fare as they fare.

V. 30—37. The greatest delinquent in the house of Ahab, was Jezebel: she introduced Baal; slew the Lord's prophets; contrived the murder of Naboth; stirred up her husband first, and then her sons, to do wickedly; a cursed woman, (v. 34.) a curse to the country, and whom all that wished well to their country, had a curse for: three reigns her reign had lasted, but now, at length, her day is come to fall. We read of a false prophetess in the church of Thyatira, that is compared to Jezebel, and called by her name; (Rev. 2: 20.) her wickedness the same, seducing God's servants to idolatry; a long space given her to repent, (v. 21.) as to Jezebel; and a fearful ruin brought on her, at last, (v. 22, 23.) as here. Jezebel's destruction may be looked upon as typical of the destruction of idolaters and persecutors, especially that great harlot, that mother of harlots, that hath made herself drunk with the blood of saints, and the nations drunk with the wine of her fornications, when God shall put it into the heart of the kings of the earth to hate her, Rev. 17: 5, 6, 16. Now here we have,

1. Jezebel daring the judgment. She posted herself in a window at the entering of the gate, to affront Jehu, and set him at defiance. See how a heart, hardened against God, will brave it out to the last, run upon Him, even upon his neck, Job 15: 26. But never did any thus harden their hearts against Him, and prosper.

(1.) Instead of humbling herself, and mourning for her son, she painted her face, and tired her head, that she might appear like herself, that is, (as she thought,) great and majestic, hoping thereby to daunt Jehu, and stop his career. There is not a surer presage of ruin, than an unhumbled heart under humbling providences. Let painted faces look in Jezebel's glass, and see how they like themselves.

(2.) Instead of trembling before Jehu, the instrument of God's vengeance, she thinks to make him tremble with that threatening question, Had Zimri peace, who slew his master? We are very apt, when in trouble, to break out into a passion against the instruments of our trouble, when we ought to be submissive to God, and angry at ourselves only. Nor is it any new thing for those that are doing God's work, to be looked upon as out of the way of peace. She pleased herself with the thought, that what Jehu was now doing, would certainly end in his own ruin. Active reformers, faithful reprovers, are threatened with trouble; but let them be in nothing terrified, Philip. 1: 28. Her precedent, Zimri, was not parallel, or it had been proper enough to give him this memorandum: the judgments of God on those that have gone before us in any sinful way, should warn us against treading in their steps. But it was misapplied: Zimri had no warrant for what he did, but was incited merely by ambition and cruelty; whereas Jehu had, and did it by order from Heaven, which would bear him out. In comparing persons and things, we must carefully distinguish between the precious and the vile, and take heed, lest from the fate of sinful we read the doom of useful men.

2. Jehu looked up to the window, not daunted at the menaces of her impudent but impotent rage, and cried, Who is on my side? Who? v. 32. Called to do God's work, in reforming the land, and punishing those that had debauched it, he here calls for assistance, Isa. 63: 5. He lifts up a

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 30—37. Some haughty transgressors have so long prospered in their crimes, and domineered over all around them, that they suppose they can outbrave all opposition, and defy even the justice of God Himself. Their hearts grow more hardened and insolent, when they are evidently upon the brink of destruction: and an unhumbled spirit, in alarming and humiliating circumstances, is a distinguishing mark of those, who 'are appointed unto wrath.'—Persons of royal extraction or authority, naturally annex the idea of sacred to their distinctions; yet they often pay no regard to the sacred service and honour of the King of kings: traitors are justly execrated, and seldom prosper: but the Lord often uses them as the instruments of his righteous vengeance against ungodly princes.—Let proud tyrants and oppressors study this chapter with fear and trembling: the loftiest will be brought low, and every one of them, in his turn, must give an account unto God, with whom 'is no respect of persons.' The anguish of Jezebel's death, and the disgrace of her mangled limbs, faintly shadow forth the misery and contempt, which at and after death will be the portion of those, who have been 'the terror of the mighty in the land of the living;' whose very memory shall rot in infamy. of Israel; it is probable, in the very beginning of it: and he died, and was succeeded by Ahaziah, in the 11th or 12th year of Jehoram; i. e. the close of the 11th, or beginning of the 12th. Verses 30—37.

She used the method, customary in the east, of giving herself a majestic appearance, by a kind of paint which dilates the eye-brows, and makes the eyes look large and bright. [The method is, to put stibium, or antimony, or black-lead, round the edge of the eye-lid, just beneath the lashes, with a brush, and to curve the eye-brows into a semi-circle, by painting and trimming them: thus making the eyes look big, which, says Grotius, 'in some countries was thought amiable.' Thus Juno was called the ox-eyed Juno, &c. Perhaps she would tempt him with her beauty. So Hewlett. ED.] Zimri had destroyed the house of Baasha, and had soon after fallen before Omri the father of Ahab: 1 K. 16:8—19.—'See how suddenly courtiers change with the fortune of their master.' Bp. Patrick.—'This cursed woman,' the daughter of a king, was also the wife of a king, the mother of two kings, the mother-in-law of a king, and the grandmother of a king, all in her own life! So vain are all earthly honors and distinctions! SCOTT.

For this being a time of great liberty, revelling and extravagance, each family is ambitious of adorning both the inside and the outside of their houses with the richest furniture; whilst crowds of both sexes, dressed out in their best apparel, and laying aside all modesty and restraint, go in and out where they please. The account of Jezebel gives us a lively idea of an eastern lady at one of these zeenahs, or solemnities. Shaw, in Calm. by Rob. art. HOUSE which see. ED.

CHAP. X.

Jehu, by letters to the elders, causes Ahab's seventy sons to be slain at Samaria, and their heads to be brought to Jezreel, 1—7. He shows this to be a fulfilment of Elijah's prophecy, and destroys all Ahab's kindred in Jezreel, 8—11. In his way to Samaria he slays forty-two of Ahaziah's brethren, 12—14. Attended by Jehonadab, he slays all that remained to Ahab in Samaria, 15—17. He assembles all the worshippers of Baal by stratagem; puts them to death, and breaks down Baal's images and temple, 18—28. He follows the sins of Jeroboam; yet the kingdom to the fourth generation is promised him, for destroying the house of Ahab, 29—31. Hazael smites Israel, 32, 33. Jehu dies, and Jehoahaz succeeds him, 34—36.

AND Ahab had [a] seventy sons [b] in Samaria. And Jehu wrote letters, and sent to Samaria, unto [c] the rulers of Jezreel, to the elders, and to [*] them that brought up Ahab's children, saying,

2 Now [d] as soon as this letter cometh to you, seeing your master's sons are with you, and there are with you chariots and horses, a fenced city also, and armor;

3 [e] Look even out the best and meetest of your master's sons, and set him on his father's throne, and [f] fight for your master's house.

4 But they were exceedingly afraid, and said, [g] Behold, two kings stood not before him: [h] how then shall we stand?

5 And he that was over the house, and he that was over the city, the elders also, and the bringers up of the children, sent to Jehu, saying, [i] We are thy servants, and will do all that thou shalt bid us; we will not make any king: do thou that which is good in thine eyes.

6 Then he wrote a letter the second time to them, saying, If ye be † mine, and if ye will hearken unto my voice, [k] take ye the heads of the men [l] your master's sons, and come to me to Jezreel by to-morrow this time. Now the king's sons being seventy persons, were with the great men of the city, which brought them up.

7 And it came to pass, when the letter came to them, that they took the king's sons, and [m] slew seventy persons, and put their heads in baskets, and sent him them to Jezreel.

8 And [n] there came a messenger, and told him, saying, They have brought the heads of the king's sons. And he said, Lay ye them in two heaps, at the entering in of the gate, [o] until the morning.

9 And it came to pass in the morning, that he went out, and stood, and said to all the people, [p] Ye be righteous: behold, [q] I conspired against my master and slew him; but who slew all these?

10 Know now, that there shall [r] fall unto the earth nothing of the word of the LORD, which the LORD spake concerning the house of Ahab: for [s] the LORD hath done that which he spake ‡ by his servant Elijah.

11 So Jehu slew all that remained of the house of Ahab in Jezreel, and all his great men, and his § kinsfolks, and [t] his priests, until [u] he left him none remaining.

12 ¶ And he arose and departed, and came to Samaria. And as he was at the ‖ shearing house in the way,

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—7. Jehu seems to have been aware of their base disposition. He was commissioned to destroy all the house of Ahab, and he was not at all scrupulous about the means of doing it.—The elders probably expected a reward from Jehu; but they seem to have been slain among the other adherents of Ahab's family. (17)—Most of these princes must have been grown men, though some might be minors or children. SCOTT.

Priests.] These seem to have been the priests, or prophets, of Baal and other idols, who had eaten at Jezebel's table, and who presided over all the others. their sense and their courage, and deserve to be upbraided with it.

2. Hereby he gained from them a submission, v. 4. They saw it was to no purpose to contend with him, and therefore it was their interest to submit. With much more reason may we thus argue ourselves into a subjection to the great God.

3. This is improved so far, as to make them the executioners of those whom they had the tuition of, v. 6. One would think he could not expect they should do it. Could they betray such a trust? Yet, so low did they stoop, in their adoration of the rising sun, that they did it, v. 7. Learn hence not to trust in a friend, nor to confide in a guide, not governed by conscience. One can scarcely expect that he who has been false to his God, should ever be faithful to his prince. But observe God's righteousness in their unrighteousness. These elders had been wickedly obsequious to Jezebel's order for the murder of Naboth, 1 K. 21: 11. now the same base spirit makes them as pliable to Jehu, and as ready to obey his orders for the murder of Ahab's sons. Let none aim at an arbitrary power, lest they be found rolling a stone which, some time or other, will return upon them. Rulers that make their people slaves, take the readiest way to make them rebels; by forcing men's consciences, as Jezebel did, they lose their hold of them.

When the separated heads were presented, he slily upbraided them, yet owned the hand of God in it. The heads were laid in two heaps, at the gate, the proper place of judgment. There he acquitted the people before God and the world, (v. 9. Ye be righteous,) and, by what the rulers of Samaria had now done, comparatively acquitted himself. It is common for those who have done something too bad, to endeavor the mitigation of their own reproach, by drawing others in to do something worse. But, he resolves all into the righteous judgment of God, v. 10. God is not the author of any man's sin, but even by that which men do from bad principles, God serves his own purposes, and glorifies his own name; and is righteous in that wherein men are unrighteous. When the Assyrian is made the rod of God's anger, and the instrument of his justice, he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so, Isa. 10: 7.

II. He proceeded to destroy all that remained of the house of Ahab, whatever their relation to him, officers of his household, ministers of state, and those in command under him, called here his great men, v. 11. all his kinsfolk and acquaintance, who had been partners with him in his wickedness, and his priests, or domestic chaplains, whom he employed in his idolatrous services, and who strengthened his hand, that he should not turn from his evil way. Having done this in Jezreel, he did the same in Samaria, v. 17. This was bloody work, and is not now, in any case, to be drawn into a precedent. Perhaps such terrible destructions as these, were intended as types of the final destruction of all the ungodly. God has a sword, bathed in heaven, which will come down on the people of his curse, and be filled with blood, Isa. 34: 5, 6. Then his eye will not spare, neither will He pity.

III. Providence bringing the brethren of Ahaziah in his way, as he was going on with this execution, he slew them likewise, v. 12—14. The brethren of Ahaziah were slain by the Arabians, (2 Chr. 22: 1.) but these were the sons of his brethren, as it is there explained; (v 8.) and they are said to be princes of Judah, and to minister to Ahaziah. Several things concurred to make them obnoxious to vengeance. 1. They were branches of Ahab's house, being descended from Athaliah, therefore fell within his commission. 2. They were tainted with the wickedness of the house of Ahab. 3. They were now going to make their court to the princes of the house of Ahab, to salute the children of the king and the queen, Joram and Jezebel, which showed they were linked to them in affection as well as in affinity. These princes, 42 in number, being appointed as sheep for the sacrifice, were slain with solemnity, at the pit of the shearing-house.

V. 15—28. Jehu, pushing on his work, is here,

I. Courting the friendship of a good man, Jehonadab the son of Rechab, v. 15, 16. This Jehonadab, though mortified to the world, and meddling little with the business of it, (as appears by his charge to his posterity, which they religiously observed 300 years after, not to drink wine, nor dwell in cities, Jer. 35: 6, &c.) yet, on this occasion, went to meet Jehu, that he might encourage him in the work to which God had called him. The countenance of good men is a thing which great men, if they be wise, will value, and value themselves by. David prayed, Let those that fear Thee turn to me, Ps. 119: 79.

1. Jehu saluted him; blessed him, so the word is; paid him the respect, and showed him the goodwill, owing to so great an example of serious godliness.

2. Jehonadab assured him he was sincere in his interest, and a hearty well-wisher to his cause. Jehu professed that his heart was right with him; that he had a true affection for his person, and a veneration for the crown of his Nazariteship, and desired to know whether he had the same affection for him, and satisfaction in that crown of royal dignity which God had put on his head, Is thine heart right? A question we should often put to ourselves. Jehonadab gave him his word, It is, and gave him his hand as a pledge of his heart,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. How soon are the most flourishing families and kingdoms desolated, when God arises to execute his judgments! —Such as bequeath his blessing to their children, in answer to their prayers, and as a gracious recompense of their faith and charity, provide in a far better manner for them, than those who leave estates to their descendants, burdened with the indignation of the Lord, for their injustice, oppression, and impiety.—Nothing, except faith, fear of God, love to his name, and the hope of eternal life, can give a decided victory over all temptations; and enable us to obey the Lord, and venture all consequences in his service.—If we call ourselves the servants of earthly potentates, they expect that our obedience to their mandates should evince the sincerity of our professions: and if we are the Lord's, we must show that we are devoted to Him by doing his will; and He never did, nor can, command any thing unjust or unreasonable.—When we look back on our deceased relatives, or forward to our own dissolution: when we reflect on the sufferings we or ours endure or fear, or on those miseries which render the earth like one great hospital, slaughter-house, and burying ground; when we consider the innumerable millions of human bodies, which have been consigned to the tomb, and are reverted to the dust; and the immense multitudes daily following: yea, when our believing thoughts make excursions into the invisible world, and survey the miseries of fallen angels, and departed souls consigned to the place of torment: or when we look forward to the resurrection and the final judgment, and view the innumerable millions of the wicked, appalled with horror and despair, attending to the awful sentence, 'Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil, and his angels:' in short, when the aggregate of all the misery in the whole creation, through eternal ages, has been considered, and the question occurs, 'Who slew all these?' the answer will be, SIN! TRANSGRESSION OF GOD'S LAW has made all this havoc, and introduced all this misery into his most perfect creation; and, worse than all this, SIN has crucified the LORD OF GLORY. Shall we then lodge this viper in our bosom, and madly seek for happiness from the cause of all possible misery? Rather we should abhor and dread it with that complete detestation, which would render its distant approach more formidable to us than any temporal pain or affliction imaginable. SCOTT.

Verses 13, 14.

All the sons of Jehoram, the father of Ahaziah, had been slain by the Philistines, during the life of Jehoram; (Notes, 2 Chr. 21:16—20. 22:1.) but these persons seem to have been the sons of Ahaziah's brethren, or his nephews. They belonged however to the family of Ahab, and fell within Jehu's commission. (M. R. x.) SCOTT.

Verses 15, 16.

(Notes, Jer. 35.) (M. R.) Some think, that Jehonadab first blessed Jehu, as Jacob had blessed Pharaoh; and that then Jehu addressed him. (Note, Gen. 47:7.) 17 And when he came to Samaria, he slew all that remained unto Ahab in Samaria, [g] till he had destroyed him, [h] according to the saying of the LORD, which he spake to Elijah.

18 And Jehu gathered all the people together, and said unto them, [i] Ahab served Baal a little; but [k] Jehu shall serve him much.

19 Now therefore call unto me [l] all the prophets of Baal, [m] all his servants, and [n] all his priests; let none be wanting: for I have a great sacrifice to do to Baal; whosoever shall be wanting, he shall not live. [o] But Jehu did it in subtlety, to the intent that he might destroy the worshippers of Baal.

20 And Jehu said, [*] Proclaim a solemn assembly for Baal. And they proclaimed it.

21 And Jehu sent through all Israel: and all the worshippers of Baal came, so that there was not a man left that came not. [p] And they came into [q] the house of Baal; and the house of Baal [r] was [†] full from one end to another.

22 And he said unto him that was over the vestry, Bring forth [s] vestments for all the worshippers of Baal. And he brought them forth vestments.

23 And Jehu went, and Jehonadab the son of Rechab, into the house of Baal, and said unto the worshippers of Baal, Search, and look that there be here with you none of the servants of the LORD, but the worshippers of Baal only.

24 And when they went in to offer sacrifices and burnt-offerings, Jehu appointed fourscore men without, and said, [t] If any of the men whom I have brought into your hands escape, he that letteth him go, his life shall be for the life of him.

25 And it came to pass, as soon as he had made an end of offering the burnt-offering, that Jehu said to the guard, and to the captains, [u] Go in, and slay them; [v] let none come forth. And they smote them with the [‡] edge of the sword; and the guard and the captains cast them out, and went to the city of the house of Baal.

26 And they brought forth the [§] images out of the house of Baal, [x] and burned them.

27 And they [y] brake down the image of Baal, and brake down the house of Baal, and made it [z] a draught-house unto this day.

indication of his designs. He seems to have ostentatiously boasted of his 'zeal for the LORD,' and wanted to have it noticed: (Notes, Num. 24: 16. Prov. 27: 2.) but in reality he was influenced by carnal policy, united with a temporary conviction, and not by genuine, pious zeal. SCOTT.

(15.) Harris considers this giving of the hand, not as an expression of private friendship, but as the solemn acknowledgment of him as king; 'for this has been usually done, as a token of subjection, at the election of rulers among the Arabs, of whose tribes was Jehonadab.' ED.

Verses 18—20.

The kings of Israel, who had seized the throne by conspiring against their predecessors, had commonly imitated or exceeded their idolatry; and this gave plausibility to Jehu's stratagem: but it was a measure which cannot be justified, or at all excused. It would have been sufficient, if he had destroyed the temples and images of Baal, and put to death the known abettors and ringleaders of his worship, and every one who should afterwards attempt to revive it. But to draw them into a snare, by a direct falsehood, and to tempt them to commit idolatry, that he might slay them in the very act, was 'to do evil, that good might come;' and resembled the abhorred maxim of those who maintain, that faith is not to be kept with heretics. (Josh. 9:19, 20. 2 Sam. 13:22—29. Rom. 3:5—8.) SCOTT.

Verse 21.

Numbers doubtless had been drawn in to bow the knee to Baal, in order to obtain the favor, or escape the displeasure of their rulers, who did not cordially approve of that idolatry, though indifferent about the worship of JEHOVAH. And these would keep away till Jehu's intentions were more manifest: but the zealous idolaters were judicially infatuated, and attended. Their number must have been small, compared with the state of things in the first days of Elijah: but Jehoram was not so zealous for the worship of Baal, as Ahab had been; and the incessant labors of Elisha, and the sons of the prophets, must have produced very great effects.—Some expositors, however, think that by the servants of Baal, (as in the original,) his worshippers in general are not meant, but the persons who ministered to the prophets and priests of Baal, as the Levites and Nethinims did to the sons of Aaron. ID.

Verses 21—27.

The house of Baal.] Wilkinson remarks, of the Egyptian temples of this and more ancient ages, 'Ponderous blocks [sometimes 40 or more ft. in length] formed those walls, which, as a temple, excited the people's religious awe,—as an impregnable fortress [comp. Judg. 9:46. 2 K. 11:11.], their submission; and their national vanity was flattered by the subjects and execution of the sculptures, and the grandeur of the monuments themselves.' The palace of the king was also connected with the temple, [comp. 2 K. 11:13, 16, 19. &c.] and 'the priests were, after the kings, the principal persons in the country; managed the affairs of state, filled all the learned professions, and were counsellors of the sovereign; who, if not of the military order, could be elected only from their order, (Plut. and Plato,) of which, in all cases, as king, it was absolute'y necessary he should become a member, and, like the caliphs, he was head of church and state. He bound himself by the rules established by their conclave, as well in the worship of the deities, to whom it was his office to sacrifice in the temples, (comp. Ezek. 45:17. 1 Sam. 13:9. 1 K. 12:31—33. &c.) as in his general mode of living; and his compliance with their regulations, was repaid by the external and public respect they manifested for his person.' Comp. Jeroboam's institutions, &c. The Egyptians, too, had their solemn assemblies, (v. 20.), 'or panegyrics,' &c. Their people were inspired with religious awe by 'the majesty of giant forms,' (the statue, called of 'Memnon,' was 23 ft. across the shoulders!) such probably was 'the image of Baal.' v.

28 Thus Jehu destroyed Baal out of Israel.

29 ¶ Howbeit from [a] the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who [b] made Israel to sin, Jehu departed not from after them, to wit, [c] the golden calves that were [d] in Beth-el, and that were in Dan.

31 But Jehu * took [h] no heed to [i] walk in the law of the LORD God of Israel with all his heart: for [k] he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, which made Israel to sin.

were vestments for all Baal's worshippers.

2. He takes care that none of the servants of the Lord should be among them, v. 23. This they took as a provision to preserve the worship of Baal from being profaned by strangers: but it was a wonder, they did not, by this, see themselves brought into a snare, and discern a design on them. They that suffer themselves to be deceived by Baal, (as all idolaters were by their idols,) no marvel if they are deceived by Jehu to their destruction.

3. He gives order for the cutting of them all off, and Jehonadab joined with him therein, v. 23. When a strict search was made, lest some of the servants of God should, either for company or curiosity, be got among them, and when 80 men were set to guard all the avenues to Baal's temple, that none might escape, (v. 24.) then the guards were sent in, to put them all to the sword, and to mingle their blood with their sacrifices, in just revenge, as they themselves had sometimes done, when they cut themselves with knives and lancets till the blood gushed out, 1 K. 18: 28. This, though seemingly barbarous, was, considering the nature of their crime, really righteous.

4. The idolaters being thus destroyed, the idolatry itself is utterly abolished. The buildings about the house of Baal, (so many, and so stately, that they are here called a city,) where Baal's priests and their families lived, were destroyed: all the little images, statues, pictures, or shrines, which beautified Baal's temple, with the great image of Baal himself, were brought out and burnt, (v. 26, 27.) and the temple of Baal broken down, and made a dunghill, the common sink, or sewer, of the city, that the remembrance of it might be blotted out, or made infamous. Thus was the worship of Baal quite destroyed, at least, for the present, out of Israel, though it had once prevailed so far, that there were but 7000 of all the thousands of Israel, that had not bowed the knee to Baal, and those concealed. Thus will God, sooner or later, triumph.

V. 29—36. Here is all the account of the reign of Jehu, though it continued 28 years. Its progress answered not to the glory of its beginning. We have here,

I. God's approbation of what Jehu had done. Many, it is probable, censured him as treacherous and barbarous; and it is justly questionable, whether he did it from a good principle, and whether he did not take some false steps in the doing of it; yet, (says God,) Thou hast done well in executing that which was right in mine eyes. Extirpating of idolaters and idolatry, was a thing right in God's eyes, for it is an iniquity He visits as surely and severely as any other: it was according to all that was in his heart, all He desired, all He designed; Jehu went through with his work, and God promised him a reward. His children of the fourth generation from him should sit upon the throne of Israel. This was more than what took place in any of the dignities or royal families of that kingdom; of the house of Ahab there were indeed four kings, Omri, Ahab, Ahaziah and Joram, but the last two were brothers, so that it reached but to the third generation, and that whole family continued but about 45 years in all, whereas Jehu's continued in four, beside himself, and, in all, about 120 years. Note, No services done for God shall go unrewarded.

II. Jehu's carelessness in what he was further

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—36. Men of eminent godliness should countenance every work of public reformation; but they are frequently too hasty in their concurrence, and too sanguine in their expectations, when those in exalted stations stand forth as the professed friends of religion: and thus they are drawn in, to sanction those wrong measures which they are unable to prevent, to the discredit of the common cause.—When men's professions are very strong, their progress very rapid, and their zeal tarnished with ostentation, or leavened with subtlety and a fickle or fierce demeanor; they may justly be suspected, and need to be watched and admonished by those, who would avoid subsequent painful reflections. Vehemence and severity indeed were in some measure consistent with the awful executions, which a righteous God commanded in these ancient times: yet the manner, in which his orders were performed, might indicate a very improper spirit. Zeal, however, in the cause of God, is worthless, except it be tempered with humility, meekness, kindness, and a peaceable frame of mind: as, furious contentions and bitter recriminations cannot adorn the Gospel, or meet the divine acceptance; for neither the wrath nor the falsehood of man can 'work the righteousness of God.' (Luke 9:51—56. Jam. 3:13—18.)—Hypocrites betray themselves by their earnestness about one part of religion, and their indifference about others: and generally profitable or plausible sins are spared, while those, which would injure them with their party, are cast off. Yet the church, and the world, may reap advantage from their partial obedience: and God will not remain as it were indebted to them; but will recompense their external services with external rewards, and at the same time visit their sins with deserved punishments. Much more then will He recompense the upright services of his believing people, who may be encouraged by this consideration to abound in his work.

(24, 25.) (1 K. 20:41, 42.) Perhaps, all the servants of Baal were not collected, nor all others separated, till the sacrifices were placed on the altar; and therefore they were permitted to go through with their worship.—We may suppose Jehonadab so much approved the substance of Jehu's service, that he was willing to allow for the informality with which it was performed: otherwise he certainly could not approve of his dissimulation, or his attendance on an idolatrous sacrifice with apparent satisfaction. Had Jehu acted from genuine zeal for the honor of God, in destroying the worship of Baal, he would also have put down the worship of the golden calves; that idolatry being as expressly forbidden by the second, as the other was by the first commandment. So that his religious zeal was partial, politic, and selfish.—The repetition used concerning Jeroboam, 'who made Israel to sin,' emphatically shows the extreme criminality of his conduct in the sight of God, as thus opening the way, and setting the example, for all the idolatries of Israel, till that kingdom was subverted. He was, in some respects, answerable for the whole. ID.

Athaliah murders the seed royal of Judah: but Joash, the infant son of Ahaziah, is preserved by Jehosheba in the temple, 1—3. Jehoiada the high priest, in the seventh year, having taken proper measures, anoints and crowns him, 4—12. Athaliah, pressing into the temple, is seized and slain, 13—16. Jehoiada makes a covenant between the LORD, the king, and the people; and destroys the worship of Baal, 17, 18. Joash reigns in peace, and the people rejoice, 19—21.

AND when [a] Athaliah [b] the mother of Ahaziah saw that her son was dead, she arose, [c] and destroyed all the [*] seed royal.

2 But [d] Jehosheba, the daughter of king Joram, sister of Ahaziah, took [f] Joash the son of Ahaziah, and stole him from among the king's sons which were slain; and [g] they hid him, even him and his nurse, [h] in the bedchamber from Athaliah, so that he was not slain.

3 And he was with her hid in the house of the LORD six years. [i] And Athaliah did reign over the land.

B. C. 878. 4 And [k] the seventh year Jehoiada sent and fetched the [l] rulers over hundreds, with [m] the captains and the guard, and brought them to him into the house of the LORD, and [n] made a covenant with them, and [o] took an oath of them in the house of the LORD, and showed them the king's son.

5 And he commanded them, saying, This is the thing that ye shall do: a third part of you [p] that enter in on the sabbath, shall even be keepers of [q] the watch of the king's house;

6 And a third part shall be at [r] the gate of Sur; and a third part at the gate behind the guard: so shall ye keep the watch of the house, that it be not broken down.

7 And two parts of all they that go forth on the sabbath, even they shall keep the watch of the house of the LORD about the king.

8 And ye shall compass the king round about, every man with his weapons in his hand: and he that cometh within the ranges, let him be slain: and be ye with the king as he goeth out and as he cometh in.

9 And the captains over the hundreds did according to all things that Jehoiada the priest commanded: and they took every man his men that were to come in on the sabbath, with them that should go out on the sabbath, and came to Jehoiada the priest.

10 And to the captains over hundreds did the priest give king David's spears and shields, that were in the temple of the LORD.

11 And the guard stood, every man with his weapons in his hand, round about the king, from the right corner of the temple to the left corner of the temple, along by the altar and the temple.

12 And he brought forth the king's son, and put upon him the crown, and gave him the testimony; and they made him king, and anointed him; and they clapped their hands, and said, God save the king.

13 Now when Athaliah heard the noise of the guard and of the people, she came to the people into the temple of the LORD.

14 And when she looked, behold, the king stood by a pillar, as the manner was, and the princes and the trumpeters by the king, and all the people of the land rejoiced, and blew with trumpets: and Athaliah rent her clothes, and cried, Treason, Treason.

15 But Jehoiada the priest commanded the captains of the hundreds, the officers of the host, and said unto them, Have her forth without the ranges: and him that followeth her kill with the sword. For the priest said, Let her not be slain in the house of the LORD.

16 And they laid hands on her; and she went by the way by the which the horses came into the king's house: and there was she slain.

17 And Jehoiada made a covenant between the LORD and the king and the people, that they should be the LORD's people; between the king also and the people.

18 And all the people of the land went into the house of Baal, and brake it down; his altars and his images brake they in pieces thoroughly, and slew Mattan the priest of Baal before the altars. And the priest appointed officers over the house of the LORD.

19 And he took the rulers over hundreds, and the captains, and the guard, and all the people of the land; and they brought down the king from the house of the LORD, and came by the way of the gate of the guard to the king's house. And he sat on the throne of the kings.

20 And all the people of the land rejoiced, and the city was in quiet: and they slew Athaliah with the sword beside the king's house.

21 Seven years old was Jehoash when he began to reign.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. (Notes, 9:27, 28. 10:13, 14.) It is probable Athaliah was left in authority, when Ahaziah went to visit Jehoram. All the seed royal. This seems to include all the males whom Athaliah knew to belong to that family, especially in the line of Solomon and Rehoboam. By this concurrence of events, Jehoshaphat's alliance with the house of Ahab proved almost the total ruin of his family; and of the house of David, from which the Messiah was to descend! To appearance, and in Athaliah's intention, it was exterminated; and indeed that branch, which descended from Jehoshaphat, was so interwoven with Ahab's devoted family, that, without a favorable construction of the sentence, none of them could have been spared: for Jehoshaphat's other sons had been slain by Jehoram, as soon as he had got possession of the throne, so that all who survived were the descendants of Ahab, as well as of Jehoshaphat. (Note, 2 Chr. 21:4.) But by an act of grace, as it were, Joash, being both a branch of the house of David, and of that of Ahab, was considered as belonging to the former family, and snatched as 'a brand from the burning.' (3:7. 1 K. 22:1—4.)—Some think he was left for dead among the other victims of Athaliah's ambition; but being taken away, he revived and was recovered. SCOTT.

Verse 4.

All the persons, whom Jehoiada first employed, seem to have been Levites; though others, by their means, were afterwards brought to concur. (2 Chr. 23:1, 2.) Perhaps Athaliah's government had grown intolerably oppressive: or Jehoiada perceived that its continuance threatened the destruction of religion: therefore the priests, and the chief of the Levites, as most immediately engaged for the support of that cause, went among their brethren, to prepare their minds to attempt a deliverance. SCOTT.

Verses 5—9.

By 'the king's house' some understand the chamber in which Joash resided; others the royal palace, from which there was an entrance into the court of the temple. [Note 10:21—27.] This was guarded by one division of those who came in on the sabbath to prevent a surprise; another was set to guard 'the gate of Sur,' or, the foundation; and another to protect the temple and courts from injury; or, as the original may mean, to guard the breach, which had been made in the temple, or its out-buildings. (2 Chr. 24:7.) [Wilson says, 'the 3 parties were to keep the 3 gates to the temple. There was no gate on the W.'] Others, of those Levites who went out on the sabbath, were stationed to guard the king himself, with orders to slay any one who attempted to come within their ranks. Two-thirds are mentioned of these Levites; as some of them might have urgent calls to return to their families.—By employing the Levites almost exclusively, all suspicion was precluded. ID.

7 And two † parts of all you that *go forth on the sabbath, even they shall keep the watch of the house of the LORD about the king.

8 And ye shall compass the king round about, every man with his weapons in his hand: and *he that cometh within the ranges, let him be slain: and be ye with the king as he goeth out, and as he cometh in.

9 And *the captains over the hundreds did according to all things that Jehoiada the priest commanded: and they took every man his men that were to come in on the sabbath, with them that should go out on the sabbath, and came to Jehoiada the priest.

10 And to the captains over hundreds did the priests give *king David's spears and shields, that were in the temple of the LORD.

15 But Jehoiada the priest commanded the *captains of the hundreds, the officers of the host, and said unto them, Have her forth without the ranges; and him that *followeth her kill with the sword. For the priest hath said, Let her not be slain in the house of the LORD.

16 And they laid hands on her: and she went by the way *by the which the horses came into the king's house: and *there was she slain.

have not a particular account of her reign; no doubt, it was of a piece with the beginning; while Jehu was extirpating the worship of Baal in Israel, she was establishing it in Judah, as appears, 2 Chr. 24: 7. The court and kingdom of Judah had been debauched by their alliance with the house of Ahab, and now one of that house is a curse and plague to both; sinful friendships speed no better: all this while, Joash lay hid; the sons and heirs of heaven are now hidden, the world knows them not; but the time is fixed when they shall appear in glory, as Joash here; by that time he was arrived at his first climacterical year, the people were grown weary of Athaliah's tyranny, and ripe for a revolution; how that revolution was effected, we are told:

I. The manager of this great affair. Jehoiada, probably the High Priest, or, at least, the Sagan, or suffragan to the High Priest; by birth and office a man in authority, whom the people were bound by the law to observe and obey, especially when there was no rightful king on the throne, Deut. 17: 12. By marriage, he was allied to the royal family, and if all the seed royal were destroyed, his wife, as daughter to Joram, had a better title to the crown than Athaliah had. By his eminent gifts and graces, he was fitted to serve his country, and better service he could not do it, than to free it from Athaliah's usurpation; and we have reason to think he did not make this attempt, till he had first asked counsel of God, either by prophets, or Urim, or both.

II. His management, discreet, and as became so wise and good a man.

1. The matter concerted with the men in office, ecclesiastical, civil, and military; he got them together, laid before them the grievances, gave them an oath of secrecy, and, finding them free and forward to join him, showed them the king's son, v. 4. So well satisfied were they too with his fidelity, that they saw no reason to suspect an imposition. We may well think what a pleasing surprise it was to the good people among them, who feared the house and lineage of David were quite cut off, to find such a spark as this in the embers.

2. The priests and Levites posted in the several avenues to the temple, to keep the guards, putting them under the command of the rulers of hundreds, v. 9. David had divided the priests into courses, which waited by turns; every sabbath day morning, a new company came into waiting, but the company of the foregoing week did not go out of waiting till the sabbath evening, so that on the sabbath day, when double service was to be done, there was a double number to do it; those Jehoiada employed to attend on this great occasion, and armed them, out of the magazines of the temple, with David's spears and shields, either his own or those taken from his enemies, which he devoted to God's honor, v. 10.

Two things they were ordered to do; protect the young king from being insulted, v. 5. and preserve the holy temple from being profaned, by the concourse of people that would come together on this occasion, v. 6. He was not so zealous for the projected revolution, as to forget his religion; in times of the greatest hurry, care must be taken that religion receive no injury. It is observable that Jehoiada appointed to each his place as well as his work; (v. 6, 7.) good order contributes very much to expedite and accomplish any great enterprise; let every man know, and keep, and make good, his post, then the work will be done quickly.

3. When the guards were fixed, then the king was brought forth, v. 12. a child indeed, but one that had a good guardian, and, which was better, a good God, to go to. Jehoiada, without delay, proceeded to the coronation; this was with great solemnity, (v. 12.) The regalia, it is probable, were kept in the temple, so the crown was ready at hand. In token of his obligation to govern by law, and to make the word of God his rule, he gave him the testimony, put a Bible into his hand, in which he must read all the days of his life, Deut. 17: 18, 19. In token of his receiving the Spirit, to qualify him for this great work, he anointed him; notice is taken of the anointing of their kings only in case of interruption, as here, and in Solomon's case; yet I know not but the ceremony might be used to all their kings, at least of the house of David, because their royalty was typical of Christ's, who was to be anointed above his fellows, above all the sons of David. In token of the people's acceptance of him, and subjection to his government, they clapped their hands for joy, and expressed their hearty good wishes to him, Let the king live; thus they made him king, their king, consented to, and concurred with, the divine appointment. They had reason to rejoice in the period now put to Athaliah's tyranny, and the prospect they had of the restoration and establishment of religion, by a king under the tuition of so good a man as Jehoiada; they had reason to welcome him to the crown, whose right it was, and to pray, Let him live; who came to them as life from the dead, and in whom the house of David was to live. With such acclamations of joy and satisfaction must the kingdom of Christ be welcomed into our hearts, when his throne is set up there, and Satan the usurper is deposed.

V. 13—16. We may suppose it was designed, when they had finished the solemnity of inauguration, to call Athaliah to an account; but, like her mother Jezebel, she went out to meet them, and hastened her own destruction.

17 ¶ And Jehoiada [r]made a covenant between the LORD and the king and the people, that they should be the LORD's people; [s]between the king also and the people.

18 And all the people of the land [t]went into the house of Baal, and brake it down; his altars and his images [u]brake they in pieces thoroughly, and [x]slew Mattan the priest of Baal before the altars: and the priest [y]appointed [z]officers over the house of the LORD.

19 And he [a]took the rulers over hundreds, and the captains, and the guard, and all the people of the land; and they brought down the king from the house of the LORD, and came [a]by the way of the gate of the guard to the king's house: and [b]he sat on the throne of the kings.

20 And all the people of the land [c]rejoiced, and the city was in quiet; and they [d]slew Athaliah with the sword beside the king's house.

21 [e]Seven years old was Jehoash when he began to reign.

CHAP. XII.

Jehoash reigns well so long as Jehoiada lives, 1—3. He gives orders that the temple should be repaired; yet the priests neglect the service; but he devises a plan for defraying the expense, and completes the work, 4—16. He gives the consecrated treasures to Hazael, to divert him from assaulting Jerusalem, 17, 18. He is slain by his servants, and succeeded by his son Amaziah, 19—21.

IN [a]the seventh year of Jehu, [b]Jehoash began to reign; and forty years reigned he in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Zibiah of Beer-sheba.

2 And [c]Jehoash did that which was right in the sight of the LORD all his days, wherein Jehoiada the priest instructed him.

3 But [d]the high places were not taken away: the people still sacrificed and burnt [r]incense in the high places.

1. Hearing the noise, she came in a fright to see what was the matter, v. 13. Jehoiada and his friends began in silence, but now that they found their strength, they proclaimed what they were doing. It seems Athaliah was little regarded, else she had had intelligence of what was doing; for aught that appears, she came alone; so neglected was she, or rather, so infatuated; whom God will destroy, He befools.

2. Seeing what was done, she cried out for help: Josephus says, she cried to have him killed, that possessed the king's place. What was now doing, was the highest justice, yet it is branded as the highest crime; she herself was the greatest traitor, and yet is first and loudest in crying, Treason, treason! Those that are themselves most guilty, are commonly most forward to reproach others.

3. Jehoiada gave orders to put her to death, as an idolater, a usurper, and an enemy to the public peace; but not in the temple, or any of the courts of it; that holy place must not be stained with the blood of any human sacrifice, though ever so justly offered. Whoever appeared for her also, should die with her, v. 15. According to these orders, she endeavoring to make her escape the back way to the palace, through the stalls, they pursued her, and there killed her, v. 16. So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord.

V. 17—21. Jehoiada has now got over the hardest part of his work; and his young prince, his way being cleared, is now to improve his advantages, perfect the revolution, and settle the government. Two things we have here:

I. The good foundation he laid, by an original contract, v. 17. Now that prince and people were together in God's house; as it should seem, before they stirred, he took care they should jointly covenant with God, and mutually with each other, that they might rightly understand their duty both to God and to one another, and be firmly bound to it.

1. He endeavored to settle and secure the interests of religion among them, by a covenant between them and God. King and people would then cleave most firmly to each other, when both had joined themselves to the Lord. God had, already, on his part, promised to be their God; now the king and people on their part must covenant; in this covenant, the king stands on the same level with his subjects, and is as much bound as any of them to serve the Lord. By this engagement they renounced Baal, whom many of them had worshipped, and resigned themselves to God's government. It is well with a people, when all the changes that pass over them, help to revive, strengthen, and advance, the interests of religion among them. And those are likely to prosper who set out in the world under fresh and sensible obligations to God and their duty. By our bonds to God the bonds of every relation are strengthened; they first gave themselves to the Lord, and then to us, 2 Cor. 8: 5.

2. He then settled both the coronation-oath, and the oath of allegiance, by which the king was obliged to govern according to law, and to protect his subjects, and they obliged, while he did so, to obey him, and to bear faith and true allegiance to him. Covenants are of use, both to remind us of, and to bind us to, those duties which are already binding on us. It is good, in all relations, for the parties to understand one another fully; and never may the ancient land-marks our fathers set before them, be removed.

II. The good beginnings he raised on those foundations. 1. They immediately abolished idolatry, which the preceding kings, in compliance with the house of Ahab, had introduced, v. 18. Every one, now they were so well headed, would lend a hand to pull down Baal's temple, his altars, and his images. All his worshippers, it should seem, deserted him; only his priest Mattan stuck to his altar alone, and there was slain, the best sacrifice ever offered on that altar. Having destroyed Baal's temple, they appointed officers over the house of God, to see that the service of God was regularly performed by the proper persons, in due time, and according to the instituted manner.

2. They expressed a mutual readiness to, and satisfaction in, each other. 1. The king was brought in state to the royal palace, and sat there on the throne of judgment, the thrones of the house of David, (v. 19.) ready to receive petitions and appeals, which he would refer to Jehoiada to give answers to, and to give judgments upon. 2. The people rejoiced, and Jerusalem was in quiet; (v. 20.) and Josephus says, they kept a feast of joy many days, making good Solomon's observation, (Prov. 11: 10.) When it goes well with the righteous, the city rejoices, and when the wicked perish, there is shouting.

CHAP. XII. This ch. gives us the history of the reign of Joash, which does not answer to that glorious beginning of it, in the foregoing ch.; he was not so illustrious at 40 years old as at 7, yet his reign is to be reckoned one of the better sort, and appears much worse in Chr. than here, (2 Chr. 24.) for there we find the blood of one of God's prophets laid at his door.

V. 1—3. The general account here given of Joash is,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When the thirst of dominion predominates, it extinguishes both common humanity and natural affection, and steels the hearts of parents, yea of mothers, against their own children or descendants. We should therefore repress the first emotions of this aspiring [self-worshipping] temper, and pray without ceasing to be kept out of the way of temptation.—What fatal consequences flow from matrimonial connections, or intimate acquaintance, with atrocious sinners! The mischiefs, which may thus be entailed on children and remote posterity, cannot be ascertained; and may extend even to the ruin of the interests of true religion, in those places where before it flourished. These reflections should add energy to the Lord's prohibition of these incongruous alliances.—The most successful villany will be short-lived: and, though in that little time dreadful havoc may be made in society, and irreligion or false religion may apparently be established on the ruins of true godliness; yet, the cause of God cannot be kept down, but, like the fabled Phœnix, it will revive from its ashes with renewed youth and vigor.—One pious man may, on some emergencies, become an instrument of most extensive good: especially when regard to the glory and worship of God, is united with prudent contrivance and well concerted measures.—Princes should be reminded, when intrusted with authority, of their accountableness to God for the use of it: and every opportunity should be embraced to enforce a conscientious regard to his Word. SCOTT.

Jehoiada, as the protector and near relation of Joash, was authorized to act for him, and the whole compact was deliberately ratified, as in the presence of God. NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 2, 3. The high places were never abolished till the days of Hezekiah. (M. R.—18:4, 22.) Jehoiada lived and retained

4 ¶ And Jehoash [e]said to the priests, All [f]the money of the *dedicated things that is brought into the house of the LORD, even [g]the money of every one that passeth the account, the money ‖ that every man is set at, [h] and all the money that ‡ cometh into any man's heart to bring into the house of the LORD,

5 Let [i]the priests take it to them, every man of his acquaintance; and [k]let them repair the breaches of the house, wheresoever any breach shall be found.

B. C. 856. 6 But it was so, that in the § three and twentieth year of king Jehoash, [l] the priests had not repaired the breaches of the house.

7 Then [m]king Jehoash called for [n]Jehoiada the priest, and the other priests, and said unto them, [o]Why repair ye not the breaches of the house? now therefore, receive no more money of your acquaintance, but deliver it for the breaches of the house.

8 And the priests consented to receive no more money of the people, neither to repair the breaches of the house.

9 But Jehoiada the priest [p]took a chest, and bored a hole in the lid of it, and set it [q]beside the altar, on the right side as one cometh into the house of the LORD: and [r]the priests that kept the ‖ door put therein all the money that was brought into the house of the LORD.

10 And it was so, when they saw that there was much money in the chest, that [s]the king's ¶ scribe and the high priest came up, and they  put up in bags, and told the money that was found in the house of the LORD.

11 And they [t]gave the money, being told, into the hands of them that did the work, that had the oversight of the house of the LORD: and they †† laid it out to the carpenters and builders, that wrought upon the house of the LORD;

12 And to [u]masons and hewers of stone, and to buy timber and hewed stone to repair the breaches of the house of the LORD, and for all that ‡‡ was laid out for the house, to repair it.

1. He reigned 40 years; as he began his reign when very young, he might, in the course of nature, have continued much longer; he was cut off when but 47, v. 1.

2. He did that which was right, as long as Jehoiada lived to instruct him, v. 2. Many young men have come too soon to an estate, have had wealth, and power, and liberty, before they knew how to use them, and it has been of bad consequence to them; but against this danger Joash was well guarded. Note, It is a great mercy to young people, and especially young men of consequence, to have those about them, that will instruct them to do that which is right in the sight of the Lord; and they then do wisely and well for themselves, when they are willing to be counselled and ruled by such: a child left to himself, brings his mother to shame, but a child left to such a tuition, may bring himself to honor and comfort.

3. The high places were not taken away, v. 3. Up and down the country, they had altars both for sacrifice and incense, to the honor of the God of Israel only, but in competition with, and at least in implied contempt of, his altar at Jerusalem. These private altars, perhaps, had been more used in the late bad reigns than formerly, because it was not safe to go up to Jerusalem, nor was the temple-service performed as it should have been; and, it may be, Jehoiada connived at them, because some well-meaning people were glad of them when they could not have better, and he hoped the reforming of the temple, and putting things into a good posture there, would, by degrees, draw people from their high places, and they would dwindle of themselves; or perhaps neither the king nor the priest had zeal enough to carry on their reformation so far, nor courage and strength enough to encounter such an inveterate usage.

V. 4—16. We have here an account of the repairing of the temple in the reign of Joash.

I. It seems, the temple was gone out of repair; Solomon built it very strong, of the best materials, and in the best manner; yet, in time, it went to decay, v. 5. even temples themselves are the worse for the wearing; the heavenly temple will never wax old. Not only the teeth of time, but the sons of Athaliah had broken it, 2 Chr. 24: 7. the priests too had not taken care to repair it in time, so it went worse and worse. Unworthy were those husbandmen to have this valuable vineyard let out to them on such easy terms, Matt. 21: 33.

II. The king himself was the first and forwardest man, and most zealous in the matter; God expects and requires those who have power, to use it for the maintenance and support of religion, the redress of grievances, and reparation of decays, to excite and engage ministers to do their part, and people theirs. The temple had been both his nursery and his sanctuary, when a child, in a grateful remembrance of which, he now appeared zealous for its honor. They who have experienced the comfort and benefit of religious assemblies, will make the reproach of them their burden, (Zeph. 3: 18.) the support of them their care, and the prosperity of them their chief joy.

III. The king had the affairs of his kingdom to mind, and could not himself inspect this affair; besides, the priests were the fittest persons, and, most likely, one would think, to be hearty in it. He gave them orders, 1. To levy the money of the dedicated things; they must not stay till it was paid in, but call for it where they knew it was due in their respective districts, either as redemption-money, by virtue of the law, (Ex. 30: 13.) or as estimation-money, by virtue of the law, (Lev. 27: 2, 3.) or as a free-will offering; (v. 4.) they were to gather every man of his acquaintance, and no man but had some. Note, We should take the opportunity God gives us of exciting those we have a particular acquaintance with, to good. 2. To lay out the money levied, in repairing the breaches of the house, v. 5.

IV. This method did not answer the intention, v. 6. Little money was raised; either the priests were careless [and dishonest], or the people backward: what money was raised, was not applied to the proper use; the priests thought the house might serve as well as it had done, therefore put it off from time to time. Church-work is usually slow work, but it is pity churchmen, of all men, should be slow at it. Perhaps, what little money they raised, they thought necessary for their own maintenance, which must needs fall much short, when ten tribes were wholly revolted, and the other two wretchedly corrupted.

V. Another method was therefore taken; the his influence, during two-thirds at least of the years that Joash reigned. SCOTT.

Verses 4, 5.

The sons of Athaliah, doubtless encouraged by her, had impiously broken down some part of the buildings, to adorn the house of Baal with the most costly materials of the temple; as well as spoiled its consecrated treasures to enrich those of their idols. The money Jehoash ordered the priests to collect, seems to have arisen from the sale of such firstlings as were not fit for sacrifice; from the half shekel apiece levied of all the people; from the redemption of things dedicated; from the redemption of those who were vowed to the Lord by a singular vow; and from voluntary contributions. ID.

Verses 6—12.

Jehoash's orders must have been very long neglected; for nothing was done effectually, till the 23d year of his reign, or the 30th of his life. Jehoiada himself appears to have been remiss in this affair; but his great age would necessarily render him less capable of active services. (2 Chr. 24:15, 16.) As the chest is said in Chr. to have been 'set without at the gate,' and that the 'princes and people cast' the money into it; it has been thought, that the chest was at first placed in the inner court; so that the money still generally passed through the hands of the priests: but that not being satisfactory, it was removed to a situation, where all had ready access to it. (2 Chr. 24:8, 10.) SCOTT.

(6.) 'Though Jehoiada was a good man, he does not appear to have had much of the spirit of an active zeal; and simple [passive] piety, without zeal and activity, is of little use when a reformation in religion and manners is necessary to be brought about. Melancthon was orthodox, pious, and learned; but he was a man of comparative inactivity. In many respects Luther was far his inferior; but, in zeal and activity, a flaming and consuming fire. Jehoiadas and Melancthons might have wished "the Reformation" in vain: Luther worked; and God worked by him, in him, and for him.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(10.) Bags.] 'It is curious, that a bag of money, sealed up by a banker's seal, now often passes current in the E. without opening it.' Burder. Among the tribute brought from different nations to the Egyptian kings, are seen bags of pearls, or gold and silver money; this money was in rings, the most ancient coin. See the monuments, and Wilkinson. ED.

13 Howbeit [x] there were not made for the house of the LORD [y] bowls of silver, snuffers, basins, [z] trumpets, any vessels of gold, or vessels of silver, of the money that was brought into the house of the LORD:

14 But they gave that to the workmen, and repaired therewith the house of the LORD.

15 Moreover [a] they reckoned not with the men, into whose hand they delivered the money to be bestowed on workmen: [b] for they dealt faithfully.

16 The [c] trespass-money and sin-money was not brought into the house of the LORD: it was the priests'.

17 ¶ Then [d] Hazael king of Syria went up, and fought [e] against Gath, and took it: and Hazael [f] set his face [g] to go up to Jerusalem.

18 And Jehoash king of Judah [h] took all the hallowed things that Jehoshaphat, and Jehoram, and Ahaziah, his fathers, kings of Judah, had dedicated, and his own hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the LORD, and in the king's house, and sent it to Hazael king of Syria: and he [*] went away from Jerusalem.

19 And [i] the rest of the acts of Joash, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?

king has his heart much upon it, v. 7. His apostasy, at last, gives us cause to question whether he had as good an affection for the service of the temple; many have been zealous for building and beautifying churches, and for other forms of godliness, who yet have been strangers to its power: however, we commend his zeal, and blame him not for reproving even his tutor Jehoiada, when he saw him remiss; and so convincing was his reproof, that the priests owned themselves unworthy to be longer employed, and consented to take some other measures, and give up the money [?] they had received, into other hands, v. 8. It was honestly done, when they found they had not spirit to do it themselves, not to hinder others from doing it. Another course was taken,

1. For raising money, v. 9, 10. It was not paid into private hands, but put into a public chest; then people brought it in readily, not only their dues, but their free-will offerings. The high priest and the secretary of state counted the money out of the chest, and laid it by in specie for the use to which it was appropriated. When public distributions are made faithfully, public contributions will be made cheerfully. But while they were getting all they could, for the repair of the temple, they did not break in upon the stated maintenance of the priests; (v. 16.) the trespass-money and the sin-money given them by that law, Lev. 5: 15, 16. were reserved to them. Let not the servants of the temple be starved, under color of repairing its breaches.

2. For laying out the money raised. They did not put it into the hands of the priests, who were not versed in affairs of this nature, but into the hands of those that did the work, or, at least, had the oversight of it, v. 11. They were fittest to be intrusted with this business, whose employment lay that way. Business is done with expedition, when those are employed in it, that understand it, and know which way to go about it. And such a reputation these got for honesty, that there was no occasion to examine their bills, or audit their accounts; let all intrusted with public money, or public work, learn hence to deal faithfully, as those that know God will reckon with them, whether men do or no; those that think it no sin to cheat the government, the country, or the church, will be of another mind, when God shall set their sins in order before them. They did not lay it out in ornaments for the temple, in vessels of gold or silver, but in necessary repairs first; (v. 13.) whence we may learn, in all our expenses, to give that the preference, which is most needful, and, in dealing for the public, to deal as we would for ourselves. After the repairs were finished, we find the overplus turned into plate, for the service of the temple, 2 Chr. 24: 14.

V. 17—21. When Joash had revolted from God, and was become both an idolater and a persecutor, the hand of the Lord went out against him, and his last state was worse than his first.

1. His wealth and honor became an easy prey to his neighbors. Hazael, when he had chastised Israel, (ch. 10: 32.) threatened Judah and Jerusalem likewise; took Gath, a strong city, (v. 17.) and thence intended to march against Jerusalem, but Joash hired him to march another way, v. 18 If it were lawful to do this for the public safety, better part with the gold of the temple than expose the temple itself; yet, had he not forsaken God, and forfeited his protection, his affairs had not been brought to this extremity. He diminished himself, and made himself very mean, in alienating the dedicated things. He impoverished himself and his kingdom; he tempted Hazael to come again, when he could bring home so rich a booty without striking a stroke; and it had this effect, for, the next year, the host of Syria came up against Jerusalem, destroyed the princes, and plundered the city, 2 Chr. 24: 23, 24.

2. His life became an easy prey to his own servants. They conspired against him, and slew him; (v. 20, 21.) not aiming at his kingdom, for they opposed not his son's succeeding him, but to be avenged on him for his murdering the prophet, (we are told in Chr.) Jehoiada's son. In this, how unrighteous soever they were, God was righteous; and this was not the only time He let even kings know it was at their peril, if they touched his anointed, and did his prophets any harm; and that when He comes to make inquisition for blood, the blood of prophets will run the account very high. Thus fell Joash, who began in the Spirit, and ended in the flesh. God usually sets marks of his displeasure on apostates, even in this life; for they, of all sinners, do most reproach the Lord.

20 And [k] his servants arose, and made a conspiracy, and slew Joash, in † the house of Millo, which goeth down to Silla.

21 For [l] Jozachar the son of Shimeath, and Jehozabad the son of [m] Shomer, his servants, smote him, and he died; and they buried him with his fathers in the city of David: and [n] Amaziah his son reigned in his stead.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Wise and pious instructors and counsellors are a singular benefit to young persons, especially when called to fill up important stations: and it is a happy case, when they acquire a proper influence, and make an unexceptionable use of it. A too favorable regard to customary violations of the divine law, and the fear of consequences in making innovations, often influence pious men to let slip the favorable opportunity of effecting still greater good. —The building or repairing of convenient places for divine worship, if done from a proper principle, is a good work which will not lose its reward.—Too often have nominal ministers been convicted of seeking their own interests, rather than those of religion. As a body, they must be suspected; and therefore should carefully avoid the appearance of this evil, lest they lose the confidence of the people, and become useless and contemptible (Mal. 1: 9—11. 2: 4—9.) It is most grievous, that the disinterested fidelity and punctuality of tradesmen and mechanics should shame the mercenary conduct of priests: or that the activity and zeal of laymen should expose the lukewarmness and indifference of the clergy! These things are not the fault of the ministerial office, but of human nature, which that office will not change. The collective body is placed in a conspicuous station, and their faults are not easily concealed: and, as more is expected from them than from others, they meet with less allowance, and indeed their misconduct admits of less excuse. It is therefore most for their own credit and comfort, and for the honor of their profession, to stand aloof from those concerns in which large sums of money are employed. (P. O. John 12: 1—8. 2 Cor. 8: 16—24.) SCOTT.

Verses 13—15.

It seems that orders were given to the workmen, that the repairs of the temple should first be completed, before any vessels were made. (2 Chr. 24:7, 14.) SCOTT.

Verses 20, 21.

The Syrians left Jehoash 'in great diseases;' and his servants, (probably some relations or friends of Jehoiada, who deeply resented the murder of his son Zechariah,) took that opportunity of slaying him.—Joash was buried in the city of David, but not in the sepulchres of the kings; 'because he had forsaken God, and slain one of his prophets.' Bp. Patrick. (2 Chr. 24:25—27.) Millo seems to have been a general name of public buildings for convening the people; and this Millo in the way to Silla, was a distinct place from Millo in the city of David. (M.—2 Sam. 5:9.) CHAP. XIII. This ch. brings us again to the history of the kings of Israel, and particularly of Jehu's family.

V. 1—9. This general account of the reign of Jehoahaz, and the state of Israel during his 17 years, though short, is long enough to let us see two things very affecting and instructive.

I. The glory of Israel raked up in the ashes, buried and lost, and turned into shame.

1. It was their honor, that they worshipped the only living and true God, a Spirit, an eternal Mind: but they lost this honor, and levelled themselves with the nations that worshipped the work of their own hands. The king followed the sins of Jeroboam, (v. 2.) and the people departed not from them, v. 6. In all the history of the ten tribes, we never find the least shock given to that idolatry, but, in every reign, still the calf was their god!

2. It was their honor, that they were taken under the special protection of Heaven. But here we find them stripped of this glory, and exposed to the insults of all their neighbors, v. 3, 22. Surely never was any nation so often plucked and pillaged as was Israel. This they brought on themselves by sin. So low was Israel brought in this reign by the many depredations the Syrians made on them, that the militia of the kingdom, and all the force they could bring into the field, were but 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 footmen, a despicable muster, v. 7. The debauching of a nation will certainly be the debasing of it.

II. It is not quite forgotten, notwithstanding all these quarrels, that this people is the Israel of God, and He the God of Israel.

1. It was the ancient honor of Israel, that they were a praying people: and here we find somewhat of that honor revived; Jehoahaz their king besought the Lord, v. 4. It becomes kings to be beggars at God's door; and the greatest of men to be humble petitioners at the footstool of his throne. Need will drive them to it.

2. It was the ancient honor of Israel, that they had God nigh unto them in all they called upon Him for, (Deut. 4: 7.) and so He was here. He might justly have rejected the prayer, yet the Lord hearkened to Jehoahaz, and gave Israel a savior; (v. 5.) not Jehoahaz himself, for, all his days, Hazael oppressed Israel, (v. 22.) but his son, to whom, in answer to his father's prayers, God gave success against the Syrians, so that he recovered the cities taken from his father, v. 25. This gracious answer God gave, in remembrance of his covenant with Abraham, (v. 23.) which, in such exigencies as these, He had long since promised to have respect to, Lev. 26: 42. See how swift God is to show mercy; how ready to hear prayers; how willing to find out any reason to be gracious! else He would not look so far back as that ancient covenant which Israel had so often broken, and forfeited all the benefit of. Let this invite and engage us for ever to Him; and encourage even those that have forsaken Him, to return and repent; for there is forgiveness with Him, that He may be feared.

V. 10—19. We have here Jehoash, or Joash, the son of Jehoahaz, and grandson of Jehu, on the throne of Israel. Probably, the house of Jehu intended some respect to the house of David, when they gave this heir-apparent to the crown, the same name with him that was then king of Judah.

I. The general account here given of him and his reign, is much the same with what we have already met with, and has little in it remarkable, v. 10—13. He was none of the worst, yet, because he kept up that ancient, politic idolatry of Jeroboam, it is said, He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord. That one evil was enough to leave an indelible mark of infamy on his name; for, how little evil soever men saw in it, it was, in the sight of the Lord, a very wicked thing; and we are sure his judgment is according to truth. It is observable, how lightly the inspired penman passes over his acts, and his might wherewith he warred, leaving it to the common historians to record them, while he takes notice only of the respect he showed Elisha. One good action shall make a better figure in God's book, than twenty great ones.

II. The particular account of what past between him and Elisha, has several things in it remarkable. 1. Elisha fell sick, v. 14. He lived

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. Joash king of Judah began to reign in the 7th year of Jehu; (12:1.) but it was probably in the beginning of the year; and if Jehu reigned a little above 28 years, Joash might have entered on his 23d year, when Jehu died and was succeeded by Jehoahaz. SCOTT.

Verse 3.

All their days.] Or, 'all his days;' there is nothing answering to their in the original; and Joash the son of Jehoahaz delivered Israel from Ben-hadad. (22—25.) ID.

Verses 4, 5.

Jehoahaz, while he deprecated the wrath of God, and entreated the removal of his heavy judgments, seems not to have attempted any reformation; or if this took place towards the conclusion of his life, his faith and repentance might not have time to produce their genuine fruits: and this is probable; for the deliverance, in answer to his prayer, was not granted till the reign of his son Joash, as it appears from the subsequent narration.—Yet some think Joash began to deliver Israel during the life of his father. (22—25.) SCOTT.

Verses 7, 8.

Jehoahaz seems to have defended himself valiantly against Hazael, though without success: this might provoke the cruelty, which Elisha had foretold; and it eventually increased the miseries of Israel. (M. R.—8:12, 13. 10:32—36. 1 Sam. 13:13—15.) ID.

Verse 10.

The 17 years of Jehoahaz reach to the 39th or 40th year of Joash king of Judah; but Jehoash of Israel began to reign in the 37th year of Joash of Judah: Jehoash must therefore have reigned some time along with his father. ID.

with his fathers; and [z] Jeroboam sat upon his throne: and Joash [a] was buried in Samaria with the kings of Israel.

14 ¶ Now Elisha was [b] fallen sick of his sickness whereof [c] he died. And Joash the king of Israel came down unto him, and wept over his face, and said, [d] O my father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof.

15 And Elisha said unto him, Take bow and arrows. And he took unto him bow and arrows.

16 And he said to the king of Israel, [*] Put thine hand upon the bow. And he put his hand upon it: and [e] Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands.

17 And he said, [f] Open the window eastward. And he opened it. Then Elisha said, Shoot: and he shot. And he said, [g] The arrow of the LORD's deliverance, and the arrow of deliverance from Syria: for thou shalt smite the Syrians in [h] Aphek, till thou have consumed them.

18 And he said, Take the arrows. And he took them. And he said unto the king of Israel, [i] Smite upon the ground. And [k] he smote thrice, and stayed.

19 And [l] the man of God [m] was wroth with him, and said, Thou shouldest have smitten five or six times; then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it: whereas [n] now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice.

long, it was now about 60 years since he was first called to be a prophet. It was a great mercy he was continued so long. Elijah finished his testimony in a fourth part of that time. All the latter part of his time, from the anointing of Jehu, which was 45 years before Joash began his reign, we find no mention made of him, or of any thing he did. He might be useful, yet not so famous as he had sometimes been. The time of his flourishing was less than the time of his living. Let not old people complain of obscurity, but rather be well pleased with retirement. The Spirit of Elijah rested on him, yet he is not sent for to heaven in a fiery chariot, but goes the common road out of the world. If God honor some above others, who yet are not inferior to them in gifts or graces, who shall find fault? May He not do what He will with his own?

2. King Joash visited him in his sickness, and wept over him, v. 14. an evidence this of some good in him; so far was he from hating and persecuting a faithful prophet as a troubler of Israel. Some who would not be obedient to the Word of God, yet have had the faithful ministers of it so manifested in their consciences, that they could not but honor them. When the king heard of Elisha's sickness, he came to visit him, and to receive his dying counsel and blessing; and it was no disparagement to him. Note, It may turn much to our spiritual advantage, to attend the sick-beds and death-beds of good ministers and other good men, that we may learn to die, and may be encouraged in religion by the living comforts they have from it in a dying hour. Elisha was very old, had been a great while useful, and, in the course of nature, could not continue long; yet the king, when he saw him sick and likely to die, wept over him. The aged are most experienced, therefore can worst be spared. In many causes, one old witness is worth ten young ones. He lamented him as Elisha lamented Elijah, My father, my father. Probably he had heard or read the words in that famous story. Note, Those that give just honors to the generation that goes before them, are often recompensed with the like from the generation that comes after them. The king was herein selfish, he lamented the loss of Elisha, because he was the chariots and horsemen of Israel, therefore could be ill spared, when Israel was so poor in chariots and horsemen, v. 7. They who consider how much good men contribute to the defence of a nation, and the keeping off of God's judgments, will see cause to lament their removal.

3. Elisha gave the king great assurances of his success against the Syrians, and encouraged him to prosecute the war against them with vigor. Elisha was aware he was loath to part with him, because he looked on him as the great bulwark of the kingdom, and depended much on his blessings and prayers; so he encouraged him, 'I die, but God will surely visit you.' He has the residue of the Spirit, and can raise up other prophets to pray for you.'

To animate him, he gives him a sign: orders him to take bow and arrows, (v. 15.) to intimate that, in order to deliverance from the Syrians he must put himself into a military posture; God would be the Agent, but he must be the instrument. And as a token of success, he directs him,

(1.) To shoot an arrow toward Syria, v. 16, 17. The arrow to be shot, was to have its significancy from the divine institution; therefore, as if he were now to be disciplined, he receives the words of command from the prophet. Nay, as if he had been a child that never drew a bow before, Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands, to signify that in all his expeditions against the Syrians, he must look up to God for direction and strength. He teacheth my hands to war, Ps. 18: 34.—144: 1 The Syrians had made themselves masters of the country that lay eastward, ch. 10: 33. Thitherward therefore the arrow is directed, and such an interpretation given by the prophet of the shooting of this arrow, though shot, in one respect, at random, as made it a commission to the king, to attack the Syrians, notwithstanding their power and possession, and a promise of success therein: it is the arrow of the Lord's deliverance. Aphek was where they are now encamped, or where they were to have a general rendezvous of their forces.

(2.) To strike with the arrows, v. 18, 19. The prophet having, in God's name, assured him of victory over the Syrians, will now try him what improvement he will make of his victories. For this, he bids him smite with the arrows on the ground. The king showed not that eagerness and flame one might have expected, but smote thrice, and no more; being willing to show mercy to them that never did, nor ever would, show mercy to him or his people. Or, perhaps, because he thought it but a silly thing, for a king to beat the floor with his arrows; thrice was enough for him to play the fool, merely to please the prophet But, by contemning the sign, he lost the thing signified, sorely to the grief of the dying prophet, who was wroth with him, and told him he should have smitten five or six times. Not being straitened in the power and promise of God, why should he be straitened in his own expectations and endeavors?

V. 20—24. 1. These verses show, 1. What power there was in Elisha's life to keep off judgments; as soon as he was dead, the bands of the Moabites invaded the land; not great armies, but roving, skulking bands, for murder and plunder by surprise. God has many ways to chastise a provoking people. The mention of this, immediately on the death of Elisha, intimates, that the re-

Verse 14.

If Elisha was called to follow Elijah, no more than seven years before the death of Ahab; and if he died as soon as Joash mounted the throne, he prophesied at least 66 years! but many think this took place towards the close of the reign of Joash. From the beginning of the reign of Jehu to Elisha's sickness and death, (that is, at least, for more than 45 years,) his name is never once mentioned; but without doubt he was very usefully employed, especially in superintending the schools of the prophets. There is ground to conclude, that great numbers were converted to God by his labors; though the bulk of the nation conformed to the idolatry established by authority. (10:21.) Neither Jehu nor Jehoahaz paid any attention to the prophet: yet they were not persecutors, and probably they respected his character. Being, however, employed in state-affairs, and determined to maintain the idolatry of the golden calves, they were not disposed to hearken to his admonitions: and he expressed his disapprobation of their conduct by keeping at a distance. (Eph. 5:8—14. 2 Thes. 3:6—9.) But when Joash heard that he was apparently near death, at a time when Israel was brought very low by iniquity, he seems to have considered the dispensation as a divine rebuke; and, under the prevalency of present convictions, he visited and lamented over him; as one whose death would more expose them to ruin, than all Hazael's successes. Yet we read of nothing, in the character or conduct of Joash, to warrant a conclusion, that this was more than a transient impression on his mind, which soon wore off without producing any abiding good effect SCOTT.

Verses 15—19.

His [the king of Syria's] dominions which lay chiefly to the north of Canaan, would not be taken from him.—Probably Joash was not informed that his victories would equal the times, which he smote with the arrows. His conduct expressed the state of his mind, as not firmly believing the words of the prophet, or not duly valuing the promised deliverance. (25) ID.

CHAP. XIV.

Amaziah reigns well, yet not like David, 1—4. He justly punishes his father's murderers, 5, 6. He gains a victory over Edom, 7. He rashly challenges Jehoash king of Israel, and, obstinately persisting, is vanquished and taken prisoner by him; the wall of Jerusalem is broken down, and the treasures of the temple spoiled, 8—14. Jehoash dies, and is succeeded by Jeroboam, 15, 16. Amaziah is slain by conspirators, 17—20. His son Azariah is made king, and builds Elath, 21, 22. Jeroboam's wicked reign, 23, 24. He restores the coast of Israel, 25—27. He dies, and is succeeded by his son Zachariah, 28, 29.

CHAP. XIV. This ch. continues the history of the succession in the kingdoms both of Judah and Israel. How many great men are made to stand in a little compass in God's book!

V. 1—7. Amaziah is the king here spoken of, the son and successor of Joash: let us take a view of him,

1. In the temple; there he acted, in some measure, well, like Joash, v. 3. began well, but did not persevere; kept up his attendance on God's altars, and his attention to God's Word, yet not like David. It is not enough merely to keep up pious usages, but we must do it from a principle of faith and devotion, with sincerity and resolution. It is here noticed, as before, that the high places were not taken away, v. 4. It is hard to get clear of those corruptions, which, by long usage, have gained both prescription and a favorable opinion.

2. On the bench; there we have him doing justice on the traitors that murdered his father; not too soon, lest it should have occasioned disturbance, but prudently, after the kingdom was confirmed in his hand, v. 5. To weaken a factious party gradually, when it is not safe to provoke, often proves the way to ruin it effectually. Justice strikes surely by striking slowly, and is often executed most prudently, when it is not executed presently. Wisdom here is profitable to direct. Amaziah did thus, according to that ancient rule, he that sheds man's blood by man shall his blood be shed. Never let traitors or murderers expect to come to their graves like other men: let them flee to the pit, and let no man stay them. Under the limitation of the law, the children of murderers he slew not; the law of Moses had expressly provided that the children should not be put to death for the fathers, v. 6. It is probable this is noticed, because there were those about him, that advised him to that rigor, both in revenge, and in policy. But he was to judge by the law of God, (Deut. 24: 16.) which he resolved to adhere to, and trust God with the issue. God visits the iniquity of the fathers on the children, because every man is guilty before Him, and owes Him a death; so that if He require the life for the father's sin, He does no wrong, the sinner having forfeited it already by his own: but He does not allow earthly princes to

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

'The Lord is slow to anger and of great mercy; [f] yet He will by no means acquit obstinate transgressors; and his just anger is the cause of all human misery. But if He answer the mere cry of distress for temporal relief, much more will He regard the prayer of faith for spiritual blessings: and, as He so long remembered his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and spared the posterity for the sake of their pious ancestors, notwithstanding their manifold provocations; much more will He remember Jesus and the covenant He mediated, and for his sake pardon the abundant transgressions of all, who by true faith stand in a spiritual relation to Him.—The true believer, though chastened for his transgression, shall not be left to perish for ever: But being [g] delivered from the hand of his enemies, he shall serve God without fear, in righteousness and holiness, before Him all his days.'—There is such excellency in true and eminent godliness, that it often excites the esteem and respect of those, who cleave to their sins.—Some parts of the lives of eminent believers are more conspicuous than others; but in the general tenor of them, they aim to glorify God and do good to man. Yet the most devoted will be ashamed, that they have not been more earnest; and the most useful must regret, that the world has received so little benefit from them. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1. Joash king of Israel began to reign about 4 years before Amaziah king of Judah: but he is supposed to have reigned part of the time with his father Jehoahaz; and Amaziah succeeded to the throne of Judah in the 2d year after the death of Jehoahaz king of Israel. Yet, as Amaziah survived Joash only 15 years, (17) either the 16 years of Joash's reign must be reckoned from his father's death; (Note, 13:10.) or, as some think, Amaziah's reign is computed from the time that his father Joash became incapable of managing public affairs. (2 Chr. 24:23—27.) SCOTT.

5 And it came to pass, as soon as the kingdom was confirmed in his hand, [f] that he slew [g] his servants which had slain the king his father.

6 But the children of the murderers he slew not: according unto that which is written in the book of the law of Moses, wherein the LORD commanded, saying, [h] The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, nor the children be put to death for the fathers; but every man shall be put to death for his own sin.

7 He [i] slew of Edom in [j] the valley of salt ten thousand, and took [*] Selah by war, and called the name of it [k] Joktheel unto this day.

8 ¶ Then [l] Amaziah sent messengers to Jehoash, the son of Jehoahaz, son of Jehu, king of Israel, saying, [m] Come, let us look one another in the face.

9 And Jehoash the king of Israel sent to Amaziah king of Judah, saying, [n] The thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife: and there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trode down the thistle.

10 Thou hast indeed smitten Edom, and [o] thine heart hath lifted thee up: [p] glory of this, and tarry at † home; for [q] why shouldest thou meddle to thy hurt, that thou shouldest fall, even thou, and Judah with thee?

11 But [r] Amaziah would not hear: therefore Jehoash king of Israel went up; and he and Amaziah king of Judah looked one another in the face at [s] Bethshemesh, which belongeth to Judah.

12 And Judah was ‡ put to the worse before Israel, and [t] they fled every man to their tents.

13 And Jehoash king of Israel [u] took Amaziah king of Judah, the son of Jehoash, the son of Ahaziah, at Beth-shemesh, and came to Jerusalem, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, from [x] the gate of Ephraim unto [y] the corner-gate, four hundred cubits.

14 And he took [z] all the gold and silver, and all the vessels that were found in the house of the LORD, and in the treasures of the king's house, [a] and hostages, and returned to Samaria.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. Many appear righteous unto men, whose inward parts are very wickedness, and whose base conduct at length betrays their hypocrisy. Yet the Lord gives due commendation to the actions which accord to his law, because thus far they honor Him.—Where his judgments are most evidently righteous, the wickedness of the instruments may deserve punishment by the sword of the magistrate: and 'the Judge of all the earth' may do many things consistently with his justice, and in his omniscience, unerring wisdom, and all-sufficiency, which would not be right for short-sighted, feeble mortals to imitate. It will appear, however, in the day of final retributions, that no one has suffered who did not deserve it, and that none perish but for their own sins.—The effects of pride in others are insufferable, even to those who are equally proud themselves; and all naturally delight in expressing contempt for such, as avowedly aim to outshine their neighbors.—Did men consider from whom, and for what, their talents and successes were given, and how prone they are to abuse them; and did they understand how mean, guilty, and polluted man is, at his best estate, their boastings must needs be excluded. In reality, all the distinctions between one sinful man and another would not be worth noting, except for the sake of relative obligations, and the peace of society: but what images can shadow forth the absurdity and madness of those, who by their daring crimes seem to challenge the Almighty to the conflict, and to rush on the thick bosses of his buckler? Or, who could have conceived such an amity and union, as the Lord invites us wretched sinners to enter into with Himself, through the mysterious union of the divine and human nature in our Emmanuel? Verse 8.

The peace between Judah and Israel had continued from the time of Asa, during above 100 years: Perhaps Amaziah bore resentment against the family of Jehu, for the slaughter of his relations: he had also received injurious treatment from the Israelites, whom he had engaged in his service, and sent back, having been forbidden to employ them. (Notes, 2 Chr. 25:6—10, 13.) In effect, he informed Joash, that he scorned to attack him at a disadvantage: but wished him to bring forth all his forces, and make a fair trial of their military skill and valor in a pitched battle. No further did the rage of the rebels extend.

3. Azariah succeeded Amaziah, but not till 12 years after his father's death, for Amaziah died in the 15 year of Jeroboam, (as appears by comparing v. 23. with v. 1.) but Azariah did not begin his reign till the 27th of Jeroboam; (ch. 25: 1.) for he was but four years old at the death of his father, so that, for 12 years, till he came to be 16, the government was in the hands of protectors: he reigned very long, (ch. 15: 2.) and yet the account of his reign is here industriously huddled up, and broken off abruptly, v. 22.

V. 23—29. Here is an account of the reign of Jeroboam the second; I doubt it is an indication of the affection and adherence of the house of Jehu to the sins of Jeroboam, that they called an heir-apparent to the crown by his name.

I. His reign was the longest of all the reigns of the kings of Israel, 41 years; yet his contemporary Azariah, king of Judah, reigned longer, even 52 years. This Jeroboam reigned just as long as Asa; (1 K. 15: 10.) yet one did good, the other evil. We cannot measure men's characters by the length of their lives, or of their outward prosperity; there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked.

II. His character was the same with that of the rest of those kings; v. 24. he kept up the worship of the calves, and never left it; but a sin is never the less evil in God's sight, whatever it is in ours, for its being an ancient usage; and a frivolous plea it will be against doing good, that we have been accustomed to do evil.

III. Yet he prospered more than most of them; for though, in that one thing, he did evil in the sight of the Lord, yet, it is likely, in other respects, there was some good found in him, and therefore God owned him,

Verse 21.

Azariah, or Uzziah, (words of similar meaning, the one signifying, The help of the Lord, and, the other, the strength of the Lord,) is thought by some to have been very young, not more than 4 years of age, when his father was slain; and they suppose that he was not made king till about 12 years afterwards. Thus he began to reign in the 27th year of Jeroboam; though his father was slain in the 15th year of Jeroboam. (23. 15:1.) But the years of Azariah's reign are reckoned from his father's death: and therefore others suppose, that Jeroboam reigned along with his father Joash 11 or 12 years; so that, reckoning his reign from this time, Azariah began to reign in his 27th year, though only 15 or 16 years after he began to reign alone. * After an interregnum of eleven years.

1. By prophecy; He raised up Jonah the son of Amittai, a Galilean; so much were they mistaken, that said, Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet, John 7: 52. It is a sign God has not cast off his people, if He continue faithful ministers among them; when Elisha was gone, who strengthened the hands of Joash, Jonah was sent to encourage his son. It is probable it was when he was a young man, and fit for such an expedition, that God sent him to Nineveh, and if so, this is an undoubted evidence of the forgiveness of his faults and follies, that he was afterward employed as a messenger of mercy to Israel. A commission amounts to a pardon, and some that have gone about their work awkwardly at first, yet afterward have proved useful and eminent; men must not be thrown away for every fault.

2. By providence; the event was according to the word of the Lord; he recovered those frontier-towns and countries that lay from Hamath in the N. to the sea of the plain, i.e. of Sodom in the S. all which the Syrians had possessed themselves of, v. 25. Two reasons are here given why God blessed them with those victories, (1.) The distress was very great, which made them objects of compassion, v. 26. Though not their repentance and reformation, yet He saw their affliction, that it was very bitter; they were miserably oppressed and enslaved, or impoverished and terrified, so that there was none shut up or left, both towns and countries were laid waste, and stripped of their wealth, and no helper appeared. To this extremity were they reduced, in many parts of the country, in the beginning of Jeroboam's reign, when God, in mere pity, wrought this deliverance by the hand of Jeroboam. Let those whose case is pitiable, take comfort from the divine pity: we read of God's bowels of mercy, (Isa. 63: 15. Jer. 31: 20.) and that He is full of compassion, Ps. 86: 15. (2.) The decree was not yet gone forth for their utter destruction; He had not as yet said, He would blot out the name of Israel, (v. 27.) and because He had not said it, He would not do it: if it be understood of the dispersion of the ten tribes, He did say it, and do it, not long after; if of the utter extirpation of Israel, He never said it, nor will ever do it, for that name still remains under heaven in the gospel-Israel, and will, to the end of time; and because they, at that time, bare that name, which was to have this lasting honor, He showed them this favor, as well as for the sake of the ancient honor of that name, ch. 13: 23.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—7. This is a short account of the reign of Azariah.

1. Most of it is general, and the same that has been given of others; he began young and reigned long; (v. 2.) and did, for the most part, what was right, v. 3.

2. What is peculiar, that God smote him with a leprosy, (v. 5.) is more largely related, with the occasion of it, 2 Chr. 26: 16, &c. where we have also a fuller account of the glories of the former part of his reign, as well as of the disgraces of the latter part of it. His son was his viceroy in the affairs both of his court, for he was over the house, and of his kingdom, for he was judging the people of the land; and it was both a comfort to him, and a blessing to his kingdom, that he had such a son to fill up his room.

V. 8—31. The best days of the kingdom of Israel were while the government was in Jehu's family; in his reign, and the next three, though there were many abominable corruptions and miserable grievances, yet the crown went in succession, the kings died in their beds, and some care was taken of public affairs.

I. Observe in general, 1. God had tried Israel both with judgments and mercies, explained and enforced by his servants the prophets, yet they continued impenitent and unreformed; therefore God justly brought these miseries on them; as Moses had warned them, Lev. 26: 24, &c.

2. God made good his promise to Jehu, that his sons, to the fourth generation after him, should sit on the throne; which was a greater favor than was shown to any royal family, before or after his.

3. All these kings did evil in the sight of the Lord, for they walked in the sins of Jeroboam. It was sad indeed, when their government was so often altered, (yet never for the better,) that among all those contending interests, none of them should think it as much their interest to destroy the calves, as others had done to support them.

4. Each of these (except one) conspired against his predecessor, and slew him, Shallum, Menahem, Pekah, and Hoshea; all traitors and murderers, yet all kings awhile; one of them 10, another 20, and another 9 years; God may suffer wickedness

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—29. Wicked princes and nations are frequently successful, because opposed by others more guilty than themselves.—The proud are often visited with most humiliating providences; and if not humbled by them, their destruction is inevitable. Yet even in those places, where ungodliness is generally prevalent, the Lord takes notice of the extreme bitterness under which men groan, and spares them from time to time, that his goodness may lead them to repentance. Especially, is He thus long-suffering to those nations, where He has a remnant of true believers.—But the lives and successes of wicked men are contracted within narrow limits, and they are soon 'driven away in their wickedness,' one after another. And though the Lord will never blot out the name of his true Israel from under heaven, but will always raise them up helpers, that the enemy may never prevail against his cause on earth: yet there is an appointed period to his patience and long suffering; beyond which He will no longer bear with impenitent sinners, corrupt professing churches, or wicked nations; but will proceed to deal with them according to the most awful denunciations of his holy Word. NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 8. Amaziah reigned 15 years after Jeroboam came to the crown of Israel; (14:17.) so that the death of Jeroboam, who reigned 41 years, coincided with the 26th or 27th year of Azariah. An interregnum of about 11 years must therefore be allowed for, in the of Judah did [n] Zachariah the son of Jeroboam reign over [o] Israel in Samaria six months.

9 And he did that which was evil in the sight of the LORD, [o] as his fathers had done: he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.

10 And Shallum the son of Jabesh conspired against him, and [p] smote him before the people, and [q] slew him, and reigned in his stead.

12 This was [s] the word of the LORD which he spake unto Jehu, saying, [t] Thy sons shall sit on the throne of Israel unto the fourth generation. [u] And so it came to pass.

[Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ Shallum the son of Jabesh began to reign in the nine and thirtieth year of [v] Uzziah king of Judah; and he reigned [*] a full [x] month in Samaria.

[n] 14:29.

to prosper, and to carry away the wealth and honors awhile, but, sooner or later, blood shall have blood, and he that dealt treacherously shall be dealt treacherously with; one wicked man is often made a scourge to another, and every wicked man, at length, a ruin to himself.

5. The ambition of the great men made the nation miserable. Here is Tiphsah, a city of Israel, barbarously destroyed, with all the coasts thereof, by one of these pretenders; (v. 16.) and, no doubt, it was through blood that each of them waded to the throne; nor could any of these kings perish alone. No land can have greater pests, nor Israel worse troubles, than such men as care not how much the welfare and repose of their country are sacrificed to their revenge, and affectation of dominion.

6. While the nation was thus shattered by divisions at home, the kings of Assyria, first one, (v. 19.) and then another, (v. 29.) came against it, and did what they pleased. Nothing does more to make a nation an easy prey to a common enemy, than intestine broils, and contests for the sovereignty; happy the land where that is settled.

7. This was Israel's condition, just before they were quite ruined, and carried away captives, for that was done in the 9th year of Hoshea, the last of these usurpers. If they had, in these days of confusion and perplexity, humbled themselves before God, and sought his face, that final destruction might have been prevented; but when God judgeth, He will overcome; these factions, the fruit of an evil spirit sent among them, hastened that captivity; for a kingdom, thus divided against itself, will soon come to desolation.

II. A short view of the particular reigns.

1. Zachariah, the son of Jeroboam, began to reign in the 38th year of Azariah, or Uzziah, king of Judah, v. 8. Some of the most critical chronologers reckon an interregnum between Jeroboam and his son Zachariah, of 22 years, others 11 years, through the disturbances and dissensions that were in the kingdom; and then it was not strange Zachariah was deposed before he was well seated on the throne: Shallum slew him before the people, perhaps, as Cæsar was slain in the senate; or, he put him to death publicly as a criminal: so ended the line of Jehu.

2. But had Shallum peace, who slew his master? one month of days measured his reign, v. 13. Perhaps to this the prophet, who then lived, refers, (Hos. 5: 7.) Now shall a month devour them with their portions. That dominion seldom lasts long, which is founded in blood and falsehood. Menahem was, probably, general of the army, which then lay encamped at Tirzah, and, hearing of Shallum's treason and usurpation, hastened to punish it, as Omri did that of Zimri in a like case, 1 K. 16: 17.

3. Menahem held the kingdom ten years, v. 17 We have heard that the kings of the house of Israel were merciful kings, (1 K. 20: 31.) but this Menahem was so prodigiously cruel, that he not only ruined a city, and the coasts thereof, but, forgetting that he himself was born of a woman, ripped up all the women with child, v. 16. We may well wonder that ever it should enter into the heart of any man, to be so barbarous, so perfectly lost to humanity itself. He hoped to strengthen himself, no doubt, and to frighten all into his interests; but it seems he durst not confide in his people, to meet an enemy, but was obliged, at a vast expense, to purchase a peace with the king of Assyria. It was part of his bargain, that he should assist him against his own subjects that were disaffected to him. The money was exacted, it is probable, by military execution, of all the mighty men of wealth, very considerately sparing the poor, and laying the burden (as was fit) on those that were best able to bear it. But so rich a booty with so little trouble, encouraged the enemy to come again, not long after, when they laid all waste; thus was he the betrayer of his country, that should have been the protector of it.

4. Pekahiah, the son of Menahem, succeeded his father, but reigned only 2 years, and then was treacherously slain by Pekah, falling under the load both of his own and of his father's wickedness. It is repeated concerning him, as before, that he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam: still that is mentioned, to show that God was righteous in bringing that destruction on them, which came not long after, because they hated to be reformed, v. 24. Pekah, it seems, had some persons of figure in his interest, two of them are here named, (v. 25.) and with their help he compassed his design.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. The study of history has a tendency to render the reflecting person thankful even for a mediocrity of character, in those placed in authority; and to dispose him to bear patiently many evident faults in the administration of public affairs. And if the inhabitants of our land of liberty and peace can read this narration, without forgetting their imaginary or trivial causes for complaint, or without blessing God for their mercies, and praying for their rulers, and the continuance of our distinguishing privileges, they cannot be acquitted from the charge of base ingratitude.—But with regret we must observe, that such is the depraved tendency of human nature to evil, that revivals in religion are commonly transient: whereas corruptions endure from age to age, and few good men have at once power and courage effectually to remove them.—The imperfections of true believers are very different from the allowed, habitual, and pertinacious wickedness of ungodly men. In the former, the remains indeed of depravity are visible, and occasionally break forth into evident evil: but in the latter case, when restraints of conscience, regard to reputation, fear of human laws, and want of power, are surmounted; the desperate wickedness of the heart, like an impetuous torrent which has burst its banks, bears down all opposition, and spreads devastation all around. Verses 13—16.

M. R.—Tiphsah. (16) A city called Tiphsah, near the Euphrates, was one boundary of Solomon's dominions. (1 K. 4:24.) But that was so far distant from Tirzah, that some other city of the same name, situated in Canaan, is supposed to be here meant. If, however, Menahem attempted to recover all that had been lost to Israel, after the death of Solomon, he might march to Tiphsah, on the Euphrates; and this might give occasion to the king of Assyria to invade his dominions.—Things were now hastening to a fatal crisis in the kingdom of the ten tribes. After the death of Elisha, true religion evidently began to decline; and neither the labors, nor the writings, of the succeeding prophets could stop the rapid increase of immorality, idolatry, or profaneness, which inundated that people. This ch. gives such an account of their public affairs, as will afford the attentive reader great assistance in understanding the writings of those prophets, who lived during that period, viz. Isaiah, Hoshea, Micah, and Amos. SCOTT.

Verses 19, 20.

A thousand talents of silver. Nearly 400,000 pounds.—The kingdom of Assyria is here mentioned, for the first time, after the building of Nineveh by Nimrod. (Note, Gen. 10:8—12.) And this shows, that the history, given by many writers, of a very prosperous and large monarchy, lasting for much above 1000 years previous to this time, is in great measure a romance. David and Solomon met with no opposition from the kings of Assyria, in establishing their kingdom, even to the Euphrates. Nor is Assyria once mentioned in their history. Assur indeed helped the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, on some occasions: but yet the very connection implies, that it was of itself not very considerable. (Ps. 83:6—8.) But it seems that Nineveh had by this time become a very great city, and no doubt the king of Nineveh had acquired a considerable territory. (Jon. 1:2. 3:3, 4. 4:11.) And some think that Pul was the king, when Jonah prophesied against Nineveh. It is not, however, agreed, whether he was one of the ancient line of the Assyrian kings; or whether he was one of those who effected that revolution, which, all allow, took place about this time; and so was the father of Tiglath-pileser. The latter indeed seems most probable: but such darkness and uncertainty rest on this part of ancient history, that the most learned men differ exceedingly in their opinions on the subject. (1 Chr. 5:25, 26. 2 Chr. 28:16—18.) SCOTT.

Of each man fifty shekels. (20) 'He gave to the king of Assyria so many shekels for every man . . . in his army. So they' (the Hebrew words) 'run exactly, "to give to the king of Assyria fifty shekels of silver for each man."' Bp. Patrick. It may be supposed, that Menahem compelled 'the mighty men of wealth' to give much more apiece than this sum, and each of them in some proportion to his affluence. ID.

(19.) Pul.] 'Called by heathen authors Pul-Belochus. By the help of Arbaces, the Mede, he vanquished Sardanapalus, the last monarch of Assyria, and translated the kingdom to Chaldea, and was the first king of Babylon and Assyria.' POOLE.

Verses 19—29.

Prideaux considers Pul to be the father of Sardanapalus (Sardan-pul) and Tilgath or Thilgath-Pileser to be Arbaces, called Thilgam by Ælian. But comp. notes 19, 20. 17: 6, &c. ED.

(25.) It does not clearly appear, whether Argob, Arieh, and the fifty Gileadites, were slain with the king; or whether they were conspirators with Pekah. SCOTT.

And smote, &c.] 'Rather, and with the aid of Argob and Arieh, and 50 Gileadites, smote him in Samaria, in the harem of his own palace.' BOOTHR.

(29.) Pul seems to have carried captive many out of those tribes which dwelt to the E. of Jordan: (1 Chr. 5:25, 26.) and Tiglath-pileser, who is, with great probability, thought to have been his son and successor, carried captive a considerable number of the inhabitants of the districts northern parts of the land, as well as the inhabitants of the districts to the east of Jordan. (M. R.)—Thus the prophecies, in this respect, had a gradual accomplishment. (17:5, 6. 18:9—12.) SCOTT.

Verse 30.

In the twentieth, &c.] That is, the 20th year from Jotham's accession; for he reigned only 16 years; (33) and Hoshea succeeded Pekah in the 4th year of Ahaz, though he was not established in the kingdom till the 12th year of that king. It is also evident from the whole narrative, that Ahaz reigned over Judah some time before the death of Pekah. (17:1.) Perhaps the conspiracy was entered into before the death of Jotham; but was not successful till 4 years after. In respect of many of these difficulties in settling the chronology, (which infidels vainly magnify into objections against the sacred history,) it may be proper to observe, that no writer wilfully contradicts himself within a few lines: and therefore some solution of the difficulty should be sought, and must exist, whether our information enable us to solve it or not. Verses 32—36.

M. R.—2 Chr. 27:—In the second year. (32) Pekah reigned 20 years. (27) Jotham therefore began his reign 17 or 18 years before the death of Pekah: consequently Pekah survived Jotham a considerable time began [k] Jotham the son of [l] Uzziah king of Judah to reign.

33 Five and twenty years old was he when he began to reign, and he reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem. B. C. 758. And his mother's name was [m] Jerusha the daughter of Zadok.

34 And he did that which was right in the sight of the LORD: he did [n] according to all that his father Uzziah had done.

35 Howbeit [o] the high places were not removed: the people sacrificed and burnt incense still in the high places. He built [p] the higher gate of the house of the LORD.

36 Now [q] the rest of the acts of Jotham, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?

37 In those days the LORD [r] began [s] to send against Judah [t] Rezin, the king of Syria, and [u] Pekah the son of Remaliah.

38 And [x] Jotham slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David his father: and [y] Ahaz his son reigned in his stead.

CHAP. XVI.

Ahaz reigns very wickedly, 1—4. Rezin and Pekah war against him; and Rezin takes Elath, 5, 6. Ahaz hires Tiglath-pileser against them, who takes Damascus and slays Rezin, 7—9. Ahaz sends a pattern of an altar from Damascus; and Urijah, the high priest, makes one like it for burnt-offerings; reserving the brazen altar for Ahaz to inquire by, 10—16. Ahaz robs and defaces the temple for the king of Assyria, 17, 18. He dies, and is succeeded by his son Hezekiah, 19, 20.

IN the [a] seventeenth year of Pekah the son of Remaliah, [b] Ahaz the son of Jotham king of Judah began to reign.

2 Twenty years old was Ahaz when he began to reign, and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem, and [c] did not that which was right in the sight of the LORD his God, like David his father.

3 But [d] he walked in the way of the kings of Israel: yea, and [e] made his son to pass through the fire, [f] according to the abominations of the heathen, whom [g] the LORD cast out from before the children of Israel.

4 And he sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places, and [h] on the hills, and under every green tree.

5 Then [b] Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah son of Remaliah king of Israel, came up to Jerusalem to war: and they besieged Ahaz, [i] but could not overcome him.

6 At that time Rezin king of Syria [k] recovered Elath to Syria, and

V. 1—4. We have here a general character of the reign of Ahaz, few and evil were his days: few, for he died at 36; evil, for,

1. He did not what was right, like David; (v. 2.) i. e. he had no love, as David had, for the temple, made no conscience of his duty to God, nor had any regard to his law. It was his honor, that he was of the house and lineage of David, and it was owing to God's ancient covenant with David, that he was now on the throne; this aggravated his wickedness.

2. He walked in the way of the kings of Israel, (v. 3.) who all worshipped the calves. They pleaded policy and reasons of state for their idolatry, but Ahaz had no such pretence, not even of affinity to these, his enemies, and who had proved enemies to themselves too by their idolatry.

3. He made his sons to pass through the fire, to the honor of his dunghill-deities; burnt them, 2 Chr. 28: 3. some of them, and perhaps made others (Hezekiah not excepted,) to pass between two fires, or to be drawn through a flame, in token of their dedication to the idol.

4. He did according to the abomination of the heathen whom the Lord had cast out. What folly and impiety!

5. He sacrificed in the high places, v. 4. Had his father taken them away, it might have prevented the debauching of his sons: they that connive at sin, know not what snares they lay for those that come after them. His was a religion of little worth, which was guided by fancy, not by faith.

V. 5—9. Here is,

1. The attempt on him of his confederate neighbors, the kings of Syria and Israel. They thought to master Jerusalem, and to set a king of their own in it, Isa. 7: 6. In that they fell short, but the king of Syria recovered Elath, a considerable port on the Red Sea, which Amaziah had taken from the Syrians, ch. 14: 22. What can they keep, that have lost their religion? Let them expect, thenceforward, to be always on the losing hand.

2. His project to get clear of them, v. 7. Those CHAP. XVI. This ch. is wholly taken up with the reign of Ahaz; quite enough of it, unless it were better. He had a good father, and a better son, yet was himself one of the worst of the kings of Judah.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13—38. The words concerning Jeroboam, so often repeated, for ages after his death, that 'he made Israel to sin,' should impress our minds with dread and horror, at the thought of tempting others to wickedness; as it can never be known how extensively or durably the mischief may spread.—When the gratification of ambition, avarice, revenge, or lust, requires it, there is no conceivable kind or degree of treachery and barbarity, which men may not be tempted to commit: yet the madness of those who thus act, equals their wickedness; for repeated examples of the fatal end of those, who through blood have waded to a throne, will not deter them from pressing forward in the same way, and mounting the slippery pre-eminence, to be thence hurried by a violent death to a premature grave! We should then be thankful for external restraints, and for being kept out of temptation; and beg of God incessantly to 'create in us a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within us:' and may He help us to seek that honor which comes from Him, to those who do good in their generation; and to dread that greatness, which is obtained and secured by doing mischief and diffusing misery.—Death in various forms hurries men to God's judgment-seat: the righteous are then taken from the evil to come, and enter into rest; and it is a mercy, to be spared the anguish of witnessing the miseries, that are coming on corrupted churches and nations. SCOTT.

as indeed the scriptures referred to (31.) fully prove. (Note, 30.) SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 3, 4. Hezekiah was born some years before the death of Jotham; if he was the son here intended, he was past his infancy at the time. (Note, 18:2.) SCOTT.

Verse 6.

(14:22.)—The word 'Jews' is here first used. It is literally the drave the Jews from * Elath: and the Syrians came to Elath, and dwelt there unto this day.

7 So Ahaz sent messengers [l] to † Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, saying, [m] I am thy servant, and thy son: come up [n] and save me out of the hand of the king of Syria, and out of the hand of the king of Israel, which rise up against me.

8 And Ahaz took [o] the silver and gold that was found in the house of the LORD, and in the treasures of the king's house, and sent it for a present [p] to the king of Assyria.

9 And the king of Assyria hearkened unto him; for the king of Assyria [q] went up against ‡ Damascus, and took it, and carried the people of it captive to [r] Kir, [s] and slew Rezin.

10 ¶ And king Ahaz went to Damascus to meet Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, [t] and saw an altar that was at Damascus: and king Ahaz sent to Urijah the priest the fashion of the altar, and [u] the pattern of it, according to all the workmanship thereof.

11 And Urijah the priest [x] built an altar according to all that king Ahaz had sent from Damascus: so [y] Urijah the priest made it against king Ahaz came from Damascus.

12 And when the king was come from Damascus, the king saw the altar; and the king [z] approached to the altar, and [a] offered thereon.

13 And [b] he burnt his burnt-offering, and his meat-offering, and poured his drink-offering, and sprinkled the blood § of his peace-offerings upon the altar.

14 And he brought also [c] the brazen altar which was before the LORD, from the forefront of the house, from between the altar and the house of the LORD, and put it on the north side of [d] the altar.

15 And king Ahaz commanded Urijah the priest, saying, Upon the great altar burn * the morning burnt-offering, and the evening meat-offering, and [f] the king's burnt-sacrifice, and his meat-offering, with the burnt-offering of all the people of the land, and their meat-offering, and their drink-offerings; and sprinkle upon it all the blood of the burnt-offering, and all the blood of the sacrifice: and the brazen altar shall be [g] for me to inquire by.

16 Thus did [h] Urijah the priest, according to all that king Ahaz commanded.

whose hearts condemn them, will go any whither in a day of distress, rather than to God. The sin itself was its own punishment; it is true he gained his point, the king of Assyria hearkened to him, and made a descent on Damascus, whereby he gave a powerful diversion to the king of Syria, (v. 9.) carrying the Syrians captive to Kir, as Amos had expressly foretold, (ch. 1: 5.) yet, considering all, he made but a bad bargain; for, to compass this,

(1.) He enslaved himself, v. 7. Had he thus humbled himself to God, and implored his favor, he might have been delivered on easier terms; to save his money, he needed only to part with his sins; but if the prodigal forsake his father's house, he soon becomes a slave to the worst of masters, Luke 15: 15.

(2.) He impoverished himself, v. 8. Both church and state must be exhausted, to gratify his new patron and guardian. I know not what authority he had thus to dispose of the public stock; but it is common for those that have brought themselves into straits by one sin, to help themselves out by another; and those that have alienated themselves from God, will make no difficulty of alienating any of his rights.

V. 10—16. Ahaz had himself sacrificed in high places, on hills, and under every green tree, (v. 4.) yet God's altar had hitherto continued in its place, and in use, and the king's burnt-offering and his meat-offering, (v. 15.) had been offered on it by the priests that attended it; but here he takes it away, and puts another altar, an idolatrous one, in the room of it—a bolder stroke than the worst of the kings had yet given to religion. We have here,

I. The model of this new altar, taken from one at Damascus, by the king himself, v. 10. Ahaz went to Damascus, to congratulate the king of Assyria on his success. There, either while viewing the rarities of the place, or rather while joining in their devotions, he saw an altar that pleased his fancy extremely, not such a plain old-fashioned one as that at Jerusalem, but curiously carved, it is likely, and adorned with image-work; many things about it were significant, he thought, surprising, charming, calculated to excite his devotion. Solomon had but a dull fancy, he thinks, compared with the ingenious artist that made this altar. The hearts of idolaters walked after their eyes, but true worshippers worship the true God by faith.

II. But, whatever pretence he had, it was most base and wicked for Urijah, that was a priest, a chief priest, to make this altar, and so readily too, in compliance with an idolatrous prince. There is not a greater disgrace to the ministry, than obsequiousness to such wicked commands; and for him to assist and serve the king, in setting up an altar to confront the altar which, by divine appointment, he was consecrated to minister at, was such a piece of treachery and perfidiousness, as may justly render him infamous to all posterity.

III. Its dedication. Urijah took care to have it ready, and set it near the brazen altar, but somewhat lower, and further from the door of the temple. The king was exceedingly pleased with it, approached to it with all possible veneration, and offered thereon his burnt-offering, &c. v. 12, 13. His sacrifices were not offered to the God of Israel, but to the gods of Damascus, as we find, 2 Chr. 28: 23. when he borrowed the Syrians' altar, no marvel that he borrowed their gods. Naaman, the Syrian, embraced the God of Israel, when he got earth from the land of Israel to make an altar of.

IV. The removal of God's altar, to make room for it. Urijah was so modest, that he put this altar at the lower end of the court, and left God's altar in its place, between this and the house of the Lord, v. 14. But that would not satisfy Ahaz; he removed God's altar to an obscure corner, in the north side of the court, and put his own before the sanctuary, in the place of it: let that be laid aside as a vessel in which there was no pleasure. His superstitious invention, at first, justled with, but at length justled out God's sacred institution. Note, Those will soon come to make nothing of God, that will not be content to make Him their all. Ahaz durst not, (perhaps for fear of the people,) quite demolish the brazen altar; but while he ordered all the sacrifices to be offered on his new altar, (v. 15.) The brazen altar (says he) shall be for me to inquire by. It was instituted, to sanctify the gifts offered upon it, but he pretends (15:19, 20, 28.) As the king of Assyria brought Ahaz into abject dependence on him, and both weakened him and drained his treasury, it is said that 'he distressed him, but strengthened him not,' (2 Chr. 28:20, 21.) though he averted the present storm.—From this time Syria ceased to be a kingdom: and the region formed successively a part of the kingdom of Assyria, of Chaldea, or of Persia; till it was subjugated by Alexander the Great; after whose death, a new kingdom of Syria was formed, which, with all his other dominions, at length became a part of the Roman empire. (Dan. 7:6.) Ahaz feared danger to his kingdom from Syria, and sought help from Assyria; whence indeed the greatest danger was to be apprehended. (Is. 7 17—25.) SCOTT.

Verses 10—16.

(2 Chr. 25:14—16. 28:22, 23.) It is uncertain whether sacrifices were offered to the gods of Damascus on this altar, or whether the oblations were presented to JEHOVAH alone.—It seems that Ahaz professed a purpose of converting the former altar into an oracle, at which he might inquire: as the church of Rome, by adoring the host, has converted the Lord's supper into the most absurd and detestable idolatry, under the pretence of honoring it. (Note, 18:4.) Ahaz's making a sun-dial of the brass of the altar is uncertain, and not probable: for we do not read, that Hezekiah made any altar, as in that case he must have done. SCOTT

17 And king Ahaz cut off [k] the borders of the bases, and removed the laver from off them; and took down [l] the sea from off the brazen oxen that were under it, and put it upon a pavement of stones:

CHAP. XVII.

Hoshea becomes tributary to Shalmaneser, conspires with the king of Egypt against him, and is shut up in prison by the king of Assyria, 1—4. Shalmaneser besieges Samaria, and after three years takes it, and carries Israel captive into Assyria and Media, 5, 6. The crimes, which brought this punishment from God on his people, 7—23. The strange nations, planted in the land, are plagued by lions, 24, 25: but, instructed by a priest of Israel in the worship of the Lord, they serve Him along with their own idols, 26—41.

IN the twelfth year of Ahaz king of Judah, began [a] Hoshea the son of Elah to reign in Samaria over Israel nine years.

to advance it above its institution, a common abuse for superstitious people. The altar was never designed for an oracle, yet Ahaz will have it for that use. The Romish church seemingly magnifies Christ's sacraments, yet wretchedly corrupts them. But some give another sense of Ahaz's purpose; 'As for the brazen altar, I will consider what to do with it, and give order about it.' The Jews say, that, afterward, of the brass of it he made that famous dial, which was called the dial of Ahaz, ch. 20: 11.

V. 17—20. Here is, 1. Ahaz abusing the temple: not the building itself, but some of the furniture of it: the bases on which the lavers were set, (1 K. 7: 28, 29.) and the molten sea, v. 17. These the priests used for washing; against them therefore he seems to have a particular spite. It is one of the greatest prejudices that can be done to religion, to obstruct the purifying of the priests, the Lord's ministers. He removed also the covert for the sabbath; erected either in honor of the Sabbath, or for the conveniency of the priests, when, on the sabbath, they officiated in greater numbers than on other days. Whatever it was, it should seem that in removing it, he intended to put a contempt on the Sabbath, and so to open as wide an inlet as any other to all manner of impiety. The king's entry, too, which led to the house of the Lord, for the convenience of the royal family, (perhaps, that ascent Solomon made, and the queen of Sheba admired,) he turned another way, to show that he did not intend to frequent the house of the Lord any more, and to oblige the king of Assyria. Those that have had a ready passage to the house of the Lord, but to please their neighbors, turn it another way, are going down hill apace toward ruin.

2. Ahaz leaving his kingdom to a better man, Hezekiah his son, as much a friend to the temple, as he had been an enemy to it: and whom God, by his grace, snatched as a brand out of the burning.

CHAP. XVII. This ch. gives us an account of the captivity of the ten tribes, and so finishes the history of that kingdom, after it had continued about 265 years, from the setting up of Jeroboam

2 And he did that which was evil in the sight of the LORD, [b] but not as the kings of Israel that were before him.

3 Against him came up [c] Shalmaneser [d] king of Assyria; [e] and Hoshea the son of Nebat. Hoshea was the last of the kings of Israel; concerning whom observe,

V. 1—6. I. He forced his way to the crown by treason and murder, (ch. 15: 30.) yet gained not the possession of it till 7 or 8 years after; he slew Pekah in the 4th year of Ahaz, but did not himself begin to reign till the 12th. v. 1. Whether by the king of Assyria, or of Judah, or by some of his own people, does not appear; but, it seems, so long he was kept out of the throne. Justly were his bad practices thus chastised, and the word of the prophet was thus fulfilled, Hos. 10: 3.

II. He was bad, yet not so bad as the kings of Israel before him, (v. 2.) not so devoted to the calves. One of them, (that at Dan,) the Jews say, had been, before this, carried away by the king of Assyria in that expedition, ch. 15: 29 to which, perhaps, the prophet refers; (Hos. 8: 5.) Thy calf, O Samaria, has cast thee off; which made him put the less confidence in the other. And some say this Hoshea, not as the former kings, permitted those who wished to go up to Jerusalem to worship. But why the destruction of the kingdom of Israel in the reign of one of the best of its kings? Thy judgments, O God, are a great deep. God would hereby show, that in bringing this ruin on them, He designed to punish, 1. Not only the sins of that generation, but of foregoing ages, that had been long treasuring up wrath against this day of wrath. 2. Not only the sins of their kings, but the sins of the people. It was an aggravation of their badness, and brought ruin the sooner, that their king did not set them so bad an example as former kings, nor hinder them from reforming.

III. The destruction came gradually. They were for some time made tributaries, before they were made captives, (v. 3.) and if that less judgment had prevailed to humble and reform them, the greater had been prevented.

IV. They brought it on themselves, by the indirect course they took to shake off the yoke of the king of Assyria, v. 4. instead of going to God.

V. It was an utter destruction.

1. The king was made a prisoner; shut up and bound; being, it is probable, taken by surprise, before Samaria was besieged.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Word of God affords abundant encouragement to pious parents to give their children good instructions, enforced by good examples, and to pray for them: and these means are so generally made effectual, as sufficiently to verify the proverb, 'Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it.' (Note, Prov. 22:6.) Yet there are exceptions recorded in the scriptures, to remind us, that every man is born in sin, and that the grace of God alone can change the heart; in order that we may expect the blessing from Him only. On the other hand, some who have been, as it were, early dedicated to Satan, and initiated into his service, have, by the victorious grace of God, been made eminent examples of faith and piety: and every accurate observer of mankind, in places favored with the light of the Gospel, has remarked instances of both.—Such is man's carnal enmity against God, that he will have recourse to any expedient, or make the most abject submission to his fellow creatures, rather than humble himself before God, and seek help from Him! But the relief thus obtained, tends to enfeeble and enslave men the more; and it often accelerates, as well as increases, that ruin which it seemed to retard.—Our natural proneness to some sort of religion [Introd. p. 4.] is not easily extinguished: but, except it be regulated according to the Word and by the Spirit of God, it produces the most absurd superstitions, or the most detestable idolatries; or at best it quiets the sinner's conscience, and amuses his mind, with a round of unmeaning ceremonies, frequently connected with the most immoral practices. Even infidels have been remarkable for credulity; and the capacity of believing, when not exercised on the truth, frequently embraces the most ridiculous falsehoods.—The arrogant self-wisdom, which induces men to new model divine ordinances after their own vain imaginations, is insufferably provoking to that 'God, who resisteth the proud:' and that external magnificence, which carnal minds affect in his worship, obscures the real glory of heavenly things, excites false ideas of the divine character, and turns men aside from that spiritual service, which alone the Lord accepts and delights in. (John 4:21—24.) Thus, new ways of worshipping God very speciously introduce gross idolatries: as the church of Israel, and that of Rome, among other examples, have abundantly evinced. SCOTT.

Verse 3.

It is most probable that Shalmaneser was the son of Tiglath-pileser.—Menahem had given his predecessor Pul footing in the land, and encouragement to come again; by raising a large sum of money for him, and by rendering his kingdom dependent on him. Ahaz king of Judah likewise, by purchasing the help of Tiglath-pileser, had procured the destruction of the kingdom of Syria, which was of small extent and became his servant, and *gave him † presents.

B. C. 725. 4 And the king of Assyria ᵉfound conspiracy in Hoshea: for he had sent messengers to So ᶠking of Egypt, and ᵍbrought no present to the king of Assyria, as he had done year by year; therefore the king of Assyria shut him up, and ʰbound him in prison.

5 Then ⁱ the king of Assyria came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it ʲthree years.

6 In the ninth year of Hoshea, ᵐthe king of Assyria took Samaria, and ⁿcarried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in ᵒHalah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of ᵖthe Medes.

[Practical Observations.]

7 For so it was, that the children of Israel

2. The land of Israel was made a prey. The army of the king of Assyria came up throughout all the land, and made themselves masters of it, (v. 5.) and used them as traitors, punished with the sword of justice, rather than as fair enemies.

3. The royal city of Israel was besieged, and, at length, taken. Three years it held out, after the country was conquered, and, no doubt, through a great deal of misery, which is not particularly recorded; but the very brevity of the story, and the passing of this matter over lightly, methinks, intimate that they were abandoned of God, and He did not now regard the affliction of Israel, as sometimes He had done.

4. The people, those of any note, were carried captives, forced away into the conqueror's country, to be slaves and beggars there, v. 6. So this unworthy people were lost, as they were found, and ended, as they began, in servitude, and under oppression. We are here told in what places of his kingdom he disposed of them; places, we may suppose, far distant from each other, lest they should keep up a correspondence, incorporate again, and become formidable. There, we have reason to think, after some time, they were so mingled with the nations, that they were lost, and the name of Israel was no more in remembrance. They that forgot God, were themselves forgotten; they that studied to be like the nations, were buried among them; and they that would not serve God in their own land, were made to serve their enemies in a strange land. Probably many of the meaner sort were left behind, many of every tribe, who either went over to Judah, or became subject to the Assyrian colonies, and their posterity were Galileans, or Samaritans. Thus ended Israel as a nation; now Canaan spued them out. When we read of their entry under Hoshea the son of Nun, who would have thought such as this should have been their exit under Hoshea the son of Elah? Thus Rome's glory in Augustus, sunk, many ages after, under Augustulus. Providence so ordered the eclipsing of the honor of the 10 tribes, that the honor of Judah the royal tribe, and Levi the holy tribe, which yet remained, might shine the brighter. Yet we find a number sealed of each of the 12 tribes, (Rev. 7.) except Dan. James writes to the 12 tribes scattered abroad, (Jam. 1: 1.) and Paul speaks of the 12 tribes which instantly served God day and night, Acts 26: 7. So that, though we never read of the return of those that were carried captive, nor have any reason to credit the conjecture of some, that they yet remain a distinct body in some remote corner of the world; yet a remnant of them did escape, to keep up the name of Israel, till it came to be worn by the gospel-church, the spiritual Israel, in which it will ever remain, Gal. 6: 16.

V. 7—23. The destruction of the kingdom of the 10 tribes is in these vs. largely commented on, and the reasons of it assigned, not taken from the second causes, the weakness of Israel, their impolitic management, and the strength and growing greatness of the Assyrian monarch, these things are overlooked; but only from the First Cause.

1. It was the Lord that removed Israel out of his sight; whoever were the instruments, He was the Author of this calamity; the Assyrian was but the rod of his anger, Isa. 10: 5. We lose the benefit of national judgments, if we do not eye the hand of God in them, and the fulfilling of the Scripture; for that also is noticed here, v. 23. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The long-suffering of God, instead of leading sinners to repentance, often renders them more secure: for, having long transgressed with impunity, they conclude that there is no danger; and thus they 'treasure up wrath against the day of wrath.' (Ec. 8:11—13. Rom. 2:4—6.)—Ungodly men are not all alike abandoned to flagrant enormities: but the least criminal deserve worse than the most severe temporal calamities; and consequently none have any right to complain, if God the righteous Sovereign shall see good, in their days, to execute on a guilty people the accumulated vengeance of many generations. (P. O. 2 Sam. 24:1—9.)—When the service of God, which is perfect freedom, is renounced, men become slaves to the vilest and most tyrannical of masters: and sinners, left to themselves, never attempt any thing more than a change of one tyrant for another; not having the most remote idea or expectation of complete liberty in the service of God. The extravagant profligate sometimes, in advancing years, exchanges the bondage of his sensual lusts, for the yoke of avarice or ambition; and the immoral and profane may commence Pharisees, or hypocrites: but mere nature can advance little further than this. Yet the Gospel calls us, not only to break our league with every lust, and to renounce every sinful connection, however formed, confirmed, or palliated by specious pretences; but to refuse obedience to every superior who would require us to sin against God; which if we would do, we must seek the effectual assistance of his special grace. force, compared with that of Assyria: and thus every rampart was broken down, which could exclude the Assyrians from the land of Israel and Judah. (15:19, 20. 16:7—9.) SCOTT.

Verse 4.

So is supposed to be the same person, as is called Sabacus, or Sabacon, in pagan writers. He was king of Ethiopia; but he invaded Egypt, took possession of the kingdom, and reigned there for a long term of years.—About this time, or rather earlier, the rivalship [for the 2d or 3d time, probably, ED.] began between the kings of Egypt, and the monarchs of different nations, who successively were powerful in Asia, to the N. or N. E. of Canaan; which, lying between the contending powers, was for many ages brought into dependence on the one or the other of them. (2 Chr. 35.20—24. Dan. 11:5. Zech. 9:8.) But the people, contrary to the commands of God, were more disposed to unite with the Egyptians, than with any of their opponents.—It seems probable, that Shalmaneser by some means took Hoshea prisoner, before he laid siege to Samaria: and that Hoshea ended his days in a prison. Verses 5, 6.

The inhabitants of Samaria doubtless endured great extremities, in the long siege and terrible destruction of the city: but the brevity of the sacred historian seems significantly to intimate, that the Lord did not now notice their affliction, as He had done before the measure of their iniquities was filled. (14:26, 27. 18:9—12. Hos. 8:7, 8. 10: 14, 15. 13:15, 16. Mic. 1:6—7.)—When Shalmaneser had taken Samaria, and become absolute master of the whole land, he formed the project of changing the inhabitants, and in part accomplished it: but it was more fully completed by Esar-haddon, his grandson, several years afterwards. (Ezra 4:2.) It is, however, here spoken of by anticipation. Yet it seems, that some of the poorer Israelites were at last left in the land, many of whom were incorporated with the new inhabitants. (2 Chr. 34:6, 7.) But, as the northern part of the country, called Galilee, was, in the time of Christ, inhabited by persons acknowledged to be of the seed of Israel, who went up to Jerusalem to worship; whilst the middle of the country was occupied by the Samaritans, who were of another origin and religion; it is probable the new inhabitants did not so fully occupy the northern, as the middle parts of the land.—Probably, the Israelites, who were carried captive to a great distance, in the dominions of the conqueror, were chiefly incorporated among the nations: yet some of them seemed to have retained the knowledge of their original, and of part of their religion; and either to have returned with their brethren after the Babylonish captivity, or to have united with those Jews, who were afterwards dispersed in many different countries of the world. (Note, Ezra 2:64. Luke 2:36—38.)—Some, however, think, that incorporated bodies of them are still existing. SCOTT.

17 And [b] they caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire, and [c] used divination and enchantments, and [d] sold themselves to do evil * in the sight of the LORD, to provoke him to anger.

18 Therefore the LORD was very angry with Israel, and [f] removed them out of his sight: there was none left but [g] the tribe of Judah only.

Word fall to the ground. But why would God ruin a people, raised and incorporated, as Israel was, by miracles and oracles? Was it purely an act of sovereignty? No, it was an act of necessary justice. For,

2. They provoked Him to do this by their wickedness. This the sacred historian shows here at large, that it might appear God did them no wrong, and that others might hear and fear. Come, and see what it was that did all this mischief, that brake their power, and laid their honor in the dust; it was sin; that, and nothing else, separated between them and God; this is here very movingly laid open, as the cause of all the desolations of Israel. He here shows,

I. What God had done for Israel, to engage them to serve Him. 1. He gave them their liberty; (v. 7.) effected their freedom with a high hand: thus they were bound in duty and gratitude to be his servants; nor would He that rescued them have contradicted Himself so far as to deliver them into the hand of the king of Assyria, had they not, by their iniquity, betrayed their liberty, and sold themselves. 2. He gave them their law, and was Himself their King; they could not plead ignorance, God had particularly charged them against those very things He here charges them with, v. 15. Nor could they doubt concerning their obligation to observe and keep the commandments and statutes of the Lord their God, v. 13. He had not dealt so with other nations, Ps. 147: 19, 20. 3. He gave them their land; and the casting out of the heathen from before them, (v. 8.) for their idolatries, was as fair a warning as could be given to Israel not to do like them.

II. What they had done against God, notwithstanding these engagements He had laid on them.

1. In general; they sinned against the Lord their God, (v. 7.) they did those things that were not right, (v. 9.) but secretly; an instance this of their atheism, that they thought, what was done in secret was from under the eye of God Himself, and would not be required. Again, they wrought wicked things in such a direct contradiction to the divine law, that it seemed as if it were done on purpose to provoke the Lord to anger, (v. 11.) in contempt

(M. R.—Notes, Neh. 9:26—30. Zech. 1:5, 6.) 'To harden the neck,' is a metaphor taken from the stiffness of the neck of an ox, when with his full strength he resists the attempts of the husbandman, to put the yoke on him, or to bring him to draw in it: and it aptly represents the self-will, earnestness, and stubbornness, with which the presumptuous sinner sets himself to rebel against God, in the midst of warnings, convictions, judgments, and mercies. (2 Chr. 30:6—9. Prov. 29:1. Is. 48:3—5.) 'This was the original of all the sins they committed, they did not believe God's prophets, but hearkened to deceivers.' Patrick. SCOTT.

Became vain.] By making and worshipping lifeless images, the people became senseless, like unto them: and by worshipping imagined deities under these images, they learned to imitate all the vices ascribed to those demons. Thus among the Greeks and Romans, the worshippers of Bacchus revelled in intemperance, those of Venus rioted in licentiousness, and those of Mars delighted in shedding human blood. The case is the same with modern idolaters. By worshipping Satan under all these names, they were conformed to the very nature, and imbibed all the hateful qualities, of that arch-apostate and rebel. Verse 16.

It is probable that the words rendered a grove and groves, (10) mean some kind of images set up in the temples originally built in groves; and not the trees which formed the grove. (Notes, 21:7, 8. v. 7. 1 K. 14:22—24.) ID.

Verse 18.

The tribe of Judah only.] I. e. the tribe of Judah, with the Benjamites, Levites, and others, who were incorporated along with Judah into one people, (SCOTT) and called Judahites or Jews, note, 16:6. ED.

Some suppose the Afghans to be the descendants of the lost tribes, others find them in the North American Indians. See Boudinot, Clarke, Rose, Sir W. Jones, &c. ID.

19 Also [h] Judah kept not the commandments of the LORD their God, but [i] walked in the statutes of Israel which they made.

20 And the LORD [k] rejected [l] all the seed of Israel, and afflicted them, and [m] delivered them into the hand of spoilers, [n] until he had cast them out of his sight.

21 For [o] he rent Israel from the house of David: and [p] they made Jeroboam the son of Nebat king: and [q] Jeroboam drave Israel from following the LORD, and made them sin [r] a great sin.

22 For the children of Israel [s] walked in all the sins of Jeroboam which he did; they departed not from them:

23 Until [t] the LORD removed Israel out of his sight, [u] as he had said by all his servants the prophets. [x] So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria, unto this day.

[Practical Observations.]

24 ¶ And [y] the king of Assyria brought men from [z] Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from [a] Ava, and from [b] Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria, instead of the children of Israel: and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt [c] in the cities thereof.

25 And so it was at the beginning of their dwelling there, that of his authority, and defiance of his justice. They rejected God's statutes, and his covenant; (v. 15.) his command, and their own consent to the covenant; therefore God justly rejected them, v. 20. See Hos. 4: 6. They left all the commandments of the Lord their God, (v. 16.) the way, and the work, the commandments prescribed; nay, lastly, they sold themselves to do evil in the sight of the Lord, that is, they wholly addicted themselves to sin, and, by their obstinate persisting in sin, so hardened their own hearts, that, at length, it was become morally impossible for them to recover themselves, as one that has sold himself has put his liberty past recall.

2. In particular; though guilty (no doubt) of many immoralities, yet nothing is here specified, but their idolatry; that was the sin that did most easily beset them, that was, of all others, most provoking to God; it was the spiritual adultery that broke the marriage covenant, and [as idolatry was but a deification of the lower propensities, it] was the inlet of all other wickedness; this is again and again mentioned here as the sin that ruined them. By this they prostituted the honor of their peculiarity, and defeated God's design concerning them, which was, that they should be distinguished from the heathen. They set up images and groves, Asherim, even wooden images, so some think that should be rendered, which we translate groves; or Ashtaroth, so others, v. 10. [the male and female principle of the universe;] probably placed in the temples originally. The setting up of these was directly contrary to the second commandment. Beside the molten images, even the two calves, they worshipped all the host of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars, for it is not meant of the heavenly host of angels; and withal, they served Baal, the deified heroes of the Gentiles, v. 16. and lastly, they used divinations and enchantments, that they might receive directions from the gods, to whom they paid their devotions.

III. What means God used with them, to bring them off from their idolatries, and to how little purpose; v. 13. We have read of the prophets, more or less in every reign; though they had forsaken God's family of priests, He did not leave them without a succession of prophets, who made it their business to teach them the good knowledge of the Lord, but all in vain; (v. 14.) they would not hear, but persisted in their idolatries, and were like their fathers: it seems to refer to their fathers in the wilderness; the same sin that kept them out of Canaan, turned these out, and that was, unbelief.

IV. How God punished them for their sins; He was very angry with them; (v. 18.) He afflicted them, (v. 20.) and delivered them into the hand of spoilers, in the days of the judges and of Saul, and afterward, in the days of most of their kings, to see if they would be awakened to consider and amend their ways; but when all these corrections did not prevail, God first rent Israel from the house of David, under which they might have been happy. As Judah was hereby weakened, so Israel was hereby corrupted; for they made king a man who drove them from following the Lord, and made them sin a great sin, v. 21. This was a national judgment, and the punishment of their former idolatries; and, at length, He removed them quite out of his sight, (v. 18, 23.) without giving them any hopes of a return from captivity.

Lastly, Here is a complaint against Judah in the midst of all; (v. 19.) though not as yet quite so bad as Israel, yet they walked in the statutes of Israel; and this aggravated the sin of Israel, that they communicated the infection of it to Judah; see Ezek. 23: 11. Those that bring sin into a country or family, bring a plague into it, and will have to answer for all the mischief that follows.

V. 24—41. When the children of Israel were dispossessed, and turned out of Canaan, the king of Assyria soon transplanted thither the supernumeraries of his own country, such as it could well spare, who should be servants to him, and masters to the Israelites that remained; and we have an account of these new inhabitants here, that we may take our leave of Samaria, as also of the Israelites that were carried captive into Assyria.

I. Concerning the Assyrians brought into the land of Israel, we are here told,

1. God sent lions among them. They were probably insufficient to people the country, which occasioned the beast of the field to multiply against them; (Ex. 23: 29.) yet, there was a manifest hand of God in it, who can serve his own purposes by small or great, lice or lions. God ordered them this rough welcome, to check their pride and insolence, and to let them know that, though they had conquered Israel, He had power to deal with them, could have prevented their settling here, and permitted it, not for their righteousness, but the wickedness of his own people, who were now under his visitation: they had lived without God in their own land, and were not plagued with lions; but if they do so in this land, it is at their peril. The God of Israel was the God of the whole world, but they ignorantly call Him the God of the land, [heathen-fashion,] apprehending themselves there-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7—23. When God arises to judgment, all opposition is vain, and only tends to prolong or increase misery. He keeps an exact register of our advantages, as well as of our sins and their aggravations: and when the day of retribution arrives, He will produce the whole account; that all the world may see 'He hath not done without cause, all that He hath done' against the workers of iniquity: for the day of his wrath will be the revelation of his righteous judgment; and indeed his justice in the temporal sufferings of guilty nations is frequently evidenced in the same manner. (Ez. 14:22, 23.)—Enormous as the outward wickedness of the world evidently is, the secret crimes, and sinful thoughts, desires, and purposes of mankind are immensely worse.—Without turning from every evil way, and unreservedly keeping the commandments and statutes of God, there can be no true godliness: yet, this conversion must spring from a belief of his testimony, both concerning 'His wrath revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men,' and concerning his mercy, in Jesus Christ, to all who repent and embrace this salvation. The rejection of his statutes and covenant is always the effect of unbelief; through which sinners harden their hearts against the fear of God, exclude the desire of his favor, and obstinately set themselves to break his commandments; and thus following lying vanities, become worthless and base, like their worldly idols.—God peculiarly abhors those, who seduce or drive others, by any means, from following Him, and cause them to sin against Him; and generations yet unborn may curse the inventors of any false religion, or plausible system of infidelity, as the occasions of their everlasting perdition: nay, bad examples alone may render men chargeable with this tremendous guilt of murdering the souls of others; for human nature is far more ready to copy the evil than the good, and to listen to tempters than to monitors. How circumspectly then should we walk, seeing such dreadful consequences may ensue, for ages to come, in various ways, from our misconduct! SCOTT.

Verse 24.

(Note, 5, 6.) Shalmaneser seems to have carried away all the chief men, and the bulk of the nation; but to have left some poor remains of the Israelites, who dwelt in the land, during the remainder of his reign, and the busy reign of Sennacherib. But Esarhaddon more entirely removed the old inhabitants, and peopled the country from different parts of his dominions: and by that time Babylon, which had formed a distinct kingdom, was brought under the government of the king of Assyria, and some of these new inhabitants were removed thence. (2 Chr. 33:11. Ezra 4:10.)—The cities in the region of Samaria had not been destroyed, but reserved for the new inhabitants. SCOTT. (M. R.)

[d] they feared not the LORD; therefore [e] the LORD sent lions among them, which slew some of them.

26 Wherefore they spake to the king of Assyria, saying, The nations which thou hast removed, [f] and placed in the cities of Samaria, [g] know not the manner of the God of the land: therefore he hath sent lions among them, and, behold, they slay them, because they know not the manner of the God of the land.

27 Then the king of Assyria commanded, saying, Carry thither [h] one of the priests whom ye brought from thence, and let them go and dwell there, and let him teach them the manner of the God of the land.

28 Then one of the priests, whom they had carried away from Samaria, came and dwelt in Beth-el, and [k] taught them how they should fear the LORD.

29 Howbeit every nation [l] made gods of their own, and put them in the houses of the high places which the Samaritans had made, every nation in their cities wherein they dwelt.

30 And the men of Babylon made Succoth-benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Ashima.

31 And [m] the Avites made Nibhaz and Tartak, and the Sepharvites [n] burnt their children in fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim.

32 So they feared the LORD, and [o] made unto themselves of the lowest of them priests of the high places, which sacrificed for them in [p] the houses of the high places.

33 They [q] feared the LORD, and served their own gods, after the manner of the nations * whom they carried away from thence.

34 Unto this day they do after the former manners: they [r] fear not the LORD, neither do they after their statutes, or after their ordinances, or after the law and commandment which the LORD commanded the children of Jacob, [s] whom he named Israel;

35 With [t] whom the LORD had made a covenant, and [u] charged them, saying, Ye shall not [x] fear other gods, nor bow yourselves to them, nor serve them, nor sacrifice to them:

36 But the LORD, who brought you up out of the land of Egypt with great power, and [y] a stretched-out arm, [z] him shall ye fear, and him shall ye worship, and to him shall ye do sacrifice.

37 And [a] the statutes, and the ordinances, and the law, and the commandment, which he [b] wrote for you, ye shall observe to do for evermore; [c] and ye shall not fear other gods.

38 And the covenant that I have made with you [d] ye shall not forget, neither shall ye fear other gods.

39 But [e] the LORD your God ye shall fear; and [f] he shall deliver you out of the hand of all your enemies.

40 Howbeit they did not hearken, [g] but they did after their former manner.

Verses 27, 28.

It is not at all probable, that this instructor was a priest of the family of Aaron, or that he taught the people from the book of the divine law; as some have thought. One of the priests 'carried away from Samaria' is expressly mentioned. He had doubtless assistants in the business.—It is, however, probable, that he did not teach them to worship JEHOVAH by images; though we can only know what he taught, by the result: but it is evident, they were led to consider JEHOVAH as the local, tutelary god of the land, one among a group of other deities; instead of worshipping Him as the one, true, eternal, almighty, and glorious Creator, Governor, and Judge of the world. (Jer. 10:6—8, 11. Zeph. 2:11. Zech. 14:6—9.) They probably learned to offer sacrifices, with some external regard to the ceremonies of the Mosaic law, but without understanding the meaning and use of the sacred ordinances: but it is not certain whether circumcision was introduced among the Samaritans at this time, or at a later period. (41. Neh. 13:23—30.) Along with these and such like observances, they were allowed, or they assumed, the liberty of serving their own idols, according to the customs of their several tribes. SCOTT.

Verses 29—31.

Such obsolete abominations, with which every thing brutal, cruel, and licentious was connected, are not worth understanding. (Ex. 23: 13. Josh. 23:7. Jer. 10:11. Zech. 13:2, 3.) SCOTT.

(31.) Nibhaz and Tartak.] Dr. A. Clarke and others make these to be, the Anubis (with a dog's head and man's body) and Cynocephalus, (with an ape's body and dog's head,) worshipped as gods by the Egyptians. ED.

Verses 33—40.

The remainder, now, of these verses seems to relate to the Israelites after they were carried captive. They still persevered in idolatry and disobedience; and, not being purified, were left to be consumed, in the furnace.—It is said, that the Israelites 'did not fear the LORD;' (34) yet the heathens, who followed their example, are said 'to have feared the LORD.' (32, 40.) The Israelites did not so much as fear the wrath of the Almighty God: but on the other hand the poor pagans feared the power of his wrath, and to avert it paid Him some ignorant worship, according to the wretched instructions given them. As this was an external acknowledgment of his power and 41 So [b] these nations feared the LORD, and served their graven images, both their children and their children's children: as did their fathers, so do they [i] unto this day.

CHAP. XVIII.

Hezekiah reigns well, abolishes idolatry, and prospers, 1—8. In his time Samaria is taken, and Israel carried captive, 9—12. Sennacherib invades Judah, and Hezekiah pays him tribute, 13—16. Rabshakeh, sent by Sennacherib, in an insulting and blasphemous speech, aims to induce the people to revolt, 17—35. Hezekiah's servants hold their peace, and rend their clothes, 36, 37.

NOW it came to pass [a] in the third year of Hoshea son of Elah king of Israel, that [b] Hezekiah the son of Ahaz king of Judah began to reign.

2 Twenty and five years old was he when he began to reign; and he reigned twenty and nine years in Jerusalem. His mother's name also was [c] Abi the daughter of Zechariah.

away,) they worshipped both the God of Israel and those other gods; but what did the captives do in the land of their affliction? Were they reformed, and brought to repentance, by their troubles? No, they do after the former manner, v. 34. When the two tribes were afterward carried into Babylon, they were cured by it of their idolatry, and therefore, after 70 years, brought back with joy; but the 10 tribes were hardened in the furnace, and therefore justly lost in it, and left to perish.

This obstinacy of theirs is here aggravated by the considerations in v. 36—40. What then? Are we better than they? No, in no wise, for both Jews and Gentiles are all under sin.

CHAP. XVIII. When the prophet had condemned Ephraim for lies and deceit, he comforted himself with this, that Judah yet ruled with God, and was faithful with the most holy, Hos. 11: 12. It was a very melancholy view the last ch. gave us of the desolations of Israel; but this shows us the affairs of Judah in a good posture at the same time, that it may appear God has not quite cast off the seed of Abraham, Rom. 11: 1.

V. 1—8. We have here a general account of the reign of Hezekiah; it appears, by comparing his age with his father's, that he was born when his father was about 11 or 12 years old, Divine Providence so ordering that he might be of full age, and fit for business then, when the measure of his father's iniquity should be full. Here is,

I. His great piety; his father was very wicked and vile, one of the worst of the kings, yet he one of the best. 1. What good there is in any, is of grace, Rom. 11: 24. 2. That grace gets over the greatest difficulties and disadvantages: Ahaz, it is likely, gave his son a bad education, as well as a bad example; Urijah, his priest, perhaps, had the tuition of him; his attendants and companions, we may suppose, were addicted to idolatry; yet Hezekiah became eminently good: when God's grace will work, what can hinder it?

(1.) He was a genuine son of David, v. 3. with whom the covenant was made, therefore he was entitled to the benefit of it. We have read of some, who did that which was right, but not like David; (ch. 14: 3.) but Hezekiah was a second David, had such a love for God's word, and God's house, as he. Let us not be frightened with an apprehension of the continual decay of virtue, as if, when times and men are bad, they must needs, of course, grow worse and worse.

(2.) He was a zealous reformer of his kingdom, (2 Chr. 29: 3.) began betimes, as soon as ever he came to the crown, and lost no time; he found his kingdom very corrupt; they had always been so, but in the last reign worse than ever, by the influence of his wicked father; a deluge of idolatry had overspread the land; therefore, as soon as he had power in his hands, he set himself to abolish it, (v. 4.) though, considering how the people were wedded to it, he might think it could not be done without opposition. We must never dishonor God, to honor our earthly parents.

The high places had sometimes been used by the prophets on special occasions, and had been hitherto connived at by the good kings, yet, because they were a breach of the law which required them to worship at the temple only, and an occasion of introducing idolatrous usages, Hezekiah, who made God's Word his rule, not the example of his predecessors, removed them; probably the terrible judgments, the kingdom of Israel was now under for their idolatry, made him the more zealous, and the people the more willing to comply with him. It is well, when our neighbors' harms are our warnings. The brazen serpent was originally of divine institution, and yet, because it had been abused to idolatry, he brake it to pieces; he showed the people it was Nehushtan, nothing else but a piece of brass, and that therefore it was an idle, wicked thing to burn incense to it; he then brake it to pieces; i. e. (so Patrick) ground it to powder, which he scattered in the air, that no fragment of it might remain. If any think the just honor of the brazen serpent was hereby diminished, they will find it abundantly made up again, John 3: 14. where our Savior makes it a type of Himself; good things, when idolized, are better parted with than kept. A firm belief of God's all-sufficiency to protect and reward us, will conduce much to make us sincere, bold, and vigorous, in the way of our duty, like Hezekiah. There was none like him, for courage and confidence in God, and for constancy and perseverance in his duty; he clave to the Lord with a fixed resolution, and never departed from following Him, v. 6. and, in every thing, made conscience of his duty.

II. His great prosperity; (v. 7, 8.) he was with God, and then God was with him, in his wars, his buildings, and especially his reformation; that good work was carried on with less difficulty than he could have expected. They that do God's work, with an eye to his glory, and with confidence in his strength, may expect to prosper in it; great is the truth, and will prevail. His throwing off the yoke of the king of Assyria, is called

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24—41. When the Lord casts off his professing people, or delivers them into the hands of their enemies, He will take care of his own glory.—The terror of the Almighty sometimes induces unconverted sinners to a forced or feigned submission: but, when instructed by ignorant or hypocritical teachers, they form very unworthy thoughts of God; expect to please Him by an outside form and a lip-labor; and endeavor to reconcile his service with that of Mammon, the love of the world, and the indulgence of their darling lusts. Thus, slavish fear, united with ignorance, produces an unwilling worship, with the worthless dregs of men's time and spirits, when the prime of them have been spent and exhausted in pursuits and pleasures more agreeable to their carnal minds; and they remain destitute of true repentance, faith, love, and devotedness to God. This kind of religion abounds from age to age, being congenial to the human heart, meeting with little disquietude from the [abused] natural conscience, and exciting no opposition from the world; or from Satan, who willingly compounds to give up a part, for a time, that he may at length engross the whole. Yet, even such a worthless form of godliness is less dishonorable to the Lord, than the confident presumption of bold hypocrites and apostates.—May that 'fear of the LORD, which is the beginning of wisdom,' possess our hearts and influence our conduct, that we may be ready for every change! SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1. Hoshea seems to have been placed on the throne above 4 years before the death of Ahaz; but his establishment in quiet possession of the kingdom might take place some time after, from which the 3d year here mentioned was reckoned. (9, 10. 15:30. 17:1.) For it is not likely, that Hezekiah reigned a year along with his father. SCOTT.

Verse 2.

Twenty and five, &c.] If we suppose Ahaz at his death had nearly completed his 37th year, and Hezekiah was only entering on his 25th when he began to reign, Ahaz must have been under 13 years of age, when his son was born! (16:1, 2.) But there are on record well-attested instances, especially in those climates, of men having children at as early a period. As Hezekiah was about 9 years of age at the death of Jotham his grandfather, perhaps some good seed, which that pious prince had sown in his tender mind, might conduce to the excellency of his character. (16:3, 4.) ID.

Verse 4.

We shall hereafter meet with a fuller account of Hezekiah's reformation.—(2 Chr. 29:—31:)—Isaiah began to prophesy in the reign of Uzziah, or Azariah: (Is. 1:1. 6:1—4.) and it is highly probable, Hezekiah became attached to him during Ahaz's life time; and received

Verse 41.

Some ascribe these words to Jeremiah, the supposed writer of this part of the history, others to Ezra after the captivity. However, these Cutheans, (as the Jews call them, from Cuthah, 24.) maintained this mongrel religion till after that latter period, and so were proper successors of idolatrous Israel, the professed people of God. About 400, B. C. a temple was built by them, in competition with the temple at Jerusalem: for, having been joined by a number of apostate Jews and a priest of the family of Aaron, they renounced gross idolatry, and became schismatical worshippers of JEHOVAH, receiving some parts, and rejecting others, of the Jewish scriptures. (27, 28. Neh. 13:23—30.) It is not requisite to decide, whether there were any true godliness among them: but, as a people, 'they knew not what they worshipped, for salvation was of the Jews.' (John 4:19—24.) Christ commanded his disciples, whom He sent forth in his life-time, not to enter into any city of the Samaritans: yet He himself spent two days at Sychar, one of their cities; (John 4:39—42.) and the apostles, after the day of Pentecost, did not regard the Samaritans as Gentiles; for they preached in their cities before the conversion of Cornelius. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. It is not enough, that we do not imitate the conduct of atrocious offenders, or that we tread in the steps of those, who have, on the whole, served God sincerely: but we should aim high; and, in aspiring at that eminence which the Scripture proposes, we should set before our eyes the most approved patterns, whose actions are there recorded; that we may follow those who have most nearly followed Christ, and most effectually served God and their generation; and thus become good examples for others. (1 Thes. 1:5—8.)—In attempting personal or public reformation, those things should be removed or avoided, which have proved occasions of evil, though not sinful in themselves. Human depravity is prone to pervert the bounty of providence into fuel for sinful lusts; and, in some circumstances, is equally propense to abuse the peculiar mercies of God into occasions of superstition and idolatry. It is natural to fallen man to put the creature in the place of the Creator, and to regard the instrument, rather than the Author, of our comforts: and though this is more evidently absurd when the instrument is irrational or inanimate; it is equally idolatrous, when the most exalted of intelligent agents are thus unduly honored. True faith needs not such aids [of relics] to devotion: the Word of God, daily meditated upon, leads the mind to realize past, future, and invisible things, as if present: thus every good end proposed by other expedients is answered, without the danger to which they expose us; and the simple scriptural use of the sacramental signs, and pledges of heavenly things, may effectually be preserved from such abuse, and answer every purpose, which can be obtained by presenting the objects of our faith to our bodily senses, in any way not warranted by the Word of God; which only tends to distract the mind, to interrupt the simple exercise of faith, to excite spurious affections, to deprave the imagination with gross and false notions of heavenly things, and to introduce, either absurd superstition, or wild enthusiasm. SCOTT.

from him those instructions, which, by the blessing of God, rendered him so illustrious an example of genuine piety, wisdom, and holiness. The prophet had occasionally been sent to Ahaz, but was the friend and counsellor of Hezekiah.—One instance of Judah's idolatry, and of Hezekiah's reformation, is mentioned in this place alone. The brazen serpent had been preserved by Israel, as a monument of the miracles wrought by means of it in behalf of their forefathers, in order to excite their gratitude, and encourage their faith and hope. (Num. 21:6—9. John 3.14, 15.) We are not informed where it was placed; but [a serpent was a form of one of the gods of Egypt, and Babylon, and] it seems that after a time the people stupidly and wickedly made an idol of it, and burnt incense to it; as if it had wrought the cures, instead of being the external sign of the powerful and merciful interposition of the Lord.—The superstitious veneration paid to sacred relics in the Christian church, and especially the adoration paid to the form of the cross, and even in express words to the wood and nails of it, with all the impostures which have arisen from that absurd idolatry, are exactly parallel to the worship of the brazen serpent; and Hezekiah's example fully authorizes the total abolition or disuse of every thing of that kind in religious worship. There were no relics under the Old Testament-church, except the pot of manna, Aaron's rod, and this brazen serpent. The two former were preserved by God's own appointment, but they were concealed in the holy of holies from popular inspection: the other was preserved by human contrivance, and became an occasion of idolatry, until a pious king, who doubtless recollected with reverence and gratitude the event commemorated by it, destroyed it with decided abhorrence. And there never were any relics preserved in the Christian church, however good the intention of the preserver might be, which have not issued in such abuses, superstitions, and impositions, as must cause all judicious friends to the Gospel to unite in earnestly praying for their extirpation. [P. O. ch. 16: and Introd. p. 4.] Yet, true piety, and fervent affection for holy things and holy men, naturally lead this way; unless sound judgment, and considerable acquaintance with human nature, and the history of superstition, counteract their efficacy. SCOTT.

Verses 5, 6.

None of the kings of Judah, from the time of the division of the kingdom, equalled Hezekiah, in the vigor and simplicity of his dependence on the Lord; in which he aspired to an equality with his progenitor David, who had reigned over the whole land. Even Asa, through weakness of faith, sought the assistance of a heathen prince; and Jehoshaphat formed an alliance with idolatrous Ahab: but Hezekiah clave to the Lord in entire confidence and unreserved obedience, to the end of his life. (22:1, 2. 1 K. 15:17—24, 2 Chr. 16:7—12. 19: 1—4.) ID.

Verse 7.

Hezekiah, who was under no personal engagements to the king of Assyria, would not stand to the agreement which his father had formed. (16:7—9. 17:3, 4.) It does not appear that he violated any treaties. ID.

Verses 9—12.

Shalmaneser began the siege of Samaria, in the beginning of the 4th year of Hezekiah, and the 7th of Hoshea; so that the three years' siege was concluded, by the end of the 6th of the former, and the 9th of the latter prince. (Notes, 1. 17:1—11.)—The desolations of Israel would tend to dispose the Jews to concur with Hezekiah, and thus facilitate his endeavors for reformation, as well as quicken him in them. ID.

Verse 13.

A few years after the reduction of Samaria, Shalmaneser died and was succeeded by his son Sennacherib. Shalmaneser doubtless would have attempted to subjugate Hezekiah; but he was otherwise employed, and this leisure was given to Hezekiah, to effect his reformation without interruption. 15 And Hezekiah [c] gave him all the silver that was found in the house of the LORD, and in the treasures of the king's house.

16 At that time did Hezekiah cut off the [d] gold from the doors of the temple of the LORD, and from the pillars which Hezekiah king of Judah had overlaid, and gave [*] it to the king of Assyria.

B. C. 712. 17 ¶ And [e] the king of Assyria sent Tartan and Rab-saris and Rabshakeh, from Lachish to king Hezekiah, with a [†] great host against Jerusalem. And they went up and came to Jerusalem: and when they were come up, they came and stood by [f] the conduit of the upper pool, which is in the highway of the fuller's field.

18 And when they had called to the king, him; it is said of the ten tribes here, that they would neither hear God's commandments, nor do them, v. 12. Many will be content to give God the hearing, that will give Him no more, (Ezek. 33: 31.) but these, being resolved not to do their duty, did not care to hear of it.

II. Of the attempt of Sennacherib, the succeeding king of Assyria, against Judah. It was a great calamity, by which God would try Hezekiah's faith, and chastise the people, who are called a hypocritical nation, (Isa. 10: 6.) because they did not heartily comply with Hezekiah's reformation, nor willingly part with their idols, but kept them up in their hearts, and, perhaps, in their houses, though their high places were removed. Even times of reformation may prove troublous times, made so by those that oppose it, and then the blame is laid on the reformers; this calamity will appear great upon Hezekiah, if we consider,

1. How much he lost of his country, v. 13. all, or most, of the fenced cities of Judah, the frontier-towns, and garrisons; and then all the rest, of course; the confusion the country was put into by this invasion, is described by Isaiah, 10: 28—32.

2. How dear he paid for his peace. Where was Hezekiah's courage? Where his confidence in God? Why did he not advise with Isaiah before he sent this crouching message? v. 14. A mean submission, and a vast sum of money; 300 talents of silver, and 30 of gold; not annually, but as a present ransom, above 200,000 pounds! How must he have felt to be forced not only to empty the public treasures, (v. 15.) but to take the gold plates off from the doors of the temple, and from the pillars, v. 16. His father Ahaz had plundered the temple in contempt; (2 Chr. 28: 24.) and he had repaid with interest what his father took, but now, with all due reverence, he begs leave to borrow it again in an exigence, and for a greater good, with a resolution to restore it in full, as soon as he should be in a capacity to do it.

V. 17—37. Here is,

I. Jerusalem besieged by Sennacherib's army, v. 17. Is this the great king, the king of Assyria? Base, false, perfidious man, worthy to be made infamous to all ages; those are wicked men indeed, and, let them be ever so great, we will call them so, whose principle is, not to make their promises binding, any further than is for their interest; now Hezekiah had too much reason to repent his treaty, which had made him much the poorer, and never the safer.

II. Hezekiah, and his princes and people, railed on by Rab-shakeh: instructed, no doubt, by Sennacherib, who intended hereby to pick a new quarrel with Hezekiah; he had promised, on the receipt of Hezekiah's money, to withdraw his army, (v. 14.) and therefore cannot for shame attack Jerusalem immediately, but sends Rab-shakeh to persuade Hezekiah to surrender it, and if he refuse, that shall serve him for a pretence to besiege it, and, if it hold out, to take it by storm. Rab-shakeh has the impudence to desire audience of the king himself without the walls; Hezekiah declines a personal treaty, and sends three commissioners, to hear what he had to say, but with a charge, not to answer him according to his folly, v. 36. One interruption they gave him, which was only to desire he would speak now in the Syrian language, and they would consider what he said, and report to the king, and if they did not give him a satisfactory answer, then he might appeal to the people, by speaking in the Jews' language, v. 26. This was a reasonable request, and agreeable to the custom of treaties, that plenipotentiaries settle matters between themselves, before any thing be made public; but Eliakim did not consider what an unreasonable man he had to deal with, for his request did but exasperate Rab-shakeh, and make him more rude and boisterous, v. 27. Against all decency and honor, instead of treating with the commissioners, he menaces the soldiery, persuades them to desert or mutiny, threatens, if they hold out, to reduce them to the last extremity, and then goes on with his discourse, the scope of which is, to persuade Hezekiah, and his princes and people, to surrender the city. In order to this,

1. He magnifies—idolizes, his master, v. 19, 23. and would possess them with the same veneration for him that he had, and thereby frighten them into submission to him; but to those who, by faith, see the King of kings in his power and glory, even the king of Assyria looks mean and little. Ps. 82: 6, 7.

2. He endeavors to make them believe it would be much for their advantage to surrender, that thus they would avoid distress and secure favor, v. 31. Gild the chain, and the vulgar will let you bind them. He thinks to soothe all with a promise, that if they would surrender on discretion, though they must expect to be prisoners and captives, yet it would really be happy for them to be so One would wonder he should ever think to prevail by such gross suggestions as these, but that the devil does thus impose on sinners every day by his temptations. Their goods are the conqueror's, yet they should have free use of them (v. 31.); but he does not explain it now as he would afterward, that it must be understood just as much

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9—16. While the interests of religion decline or are run down in one place, the Lord takes care that they shall revive and flourish in another. The judgments, which desolate degenerate churches and nations, instead of injuring his cause, tend to warm, animate, and embolden others in personal religion, and in attempting public reformation; nay, they often facilitate the work of active instruments in religious revivals, by intimidating opposers, and exciting those who were indifferent, or reluctant to assist.—Yet the believer, when pursuing heavenly things, and seeking the glory of God, with the greatest simplicity and most vigorous affections, must stand prepared for trouble. For when the Almighty is pleased to remove his restraining hand, Satan and wicked men will assault him, with rancor and vehemence: and the Lord often permits them to do this; for He regards not so much the present transient feelings of his beloved servants, as the final happy and glorious event of their trials and conflicts. Nations also may meet with public calamities, when true religion is most vigorously and successfully promoted, by the general concurrence of all orders of men. (2 Chr. 20:1—4. Ps. 44:17—22.) The secret dislike, the hypocrisy, and the lukewarmness of numbers require correction: while trials tend to purify the faith and hope of upright persons; to bring them to greater simplicity in their zeal for the honor of God, and in their dependence on his help; and to increase the fervency of their addresses at the throne of grace: and thus they make way for the fuller display of the glory of God in their deliverance. SCOTT.

mounted the throne, emulated his father's military honors, and imitated his example. He therefore purposed to treat Jerusalem and Judah, as Shalmaneser had done Samaria and Israel: and it pleased God to chastise the lukewarmness, hypocrisy, or reluctancy, with which many of the Jews concurred in Hezekiah's reformation, and to try his faith, and that of other believers, by permitting this potent monarch to reduce the other fenced cities and strong-holds of Judah, and to threaten Jerusalem with a siege. Verses 14—16.

Hezekiah seems rather to have sinned, by yielding in so timid a manner. He evidently distrusted God's protection: (Gen. 12.11—16.)—The event shows, that if he had boldly stood out, and committed his cause to God, he would have been protected. But though Hezekiah's conduct might perhaps be reprehensible; yet it served to render Sennacherib's subsequent violence more inexcusable. (M. R.—2 Chr. 32:3—8.) SCOTT.

Verse 17.

This 2nd invasion is computed by some to have been 3 years after the former agreement; during which time Sennacherib was occupied in other wars. But it seems more probable from the narrative, that he returned the ensuing year. (Is. 36:2.) ID.

Verses 20, 21.

It does not appear that Hezekiah, after the preceding agreement, had refused to pay tribute to the king of Assyria, or had attempted to shake off his yoke: but when he found him determined to destroy Jerusalem and enslave its inhabitants, he refused to surrender at discretion, and prepared to stand a siege.—He had not put his trust in Egypt, though probably many of his nobles were disposed to, and some engagements of that kind had before been attempted. These were hyperbolical expressions, denoting the utmost extremities of famine, which the people must expect to endure, in case they dared to resist the king of Assyria. (M. and M. R.) SCOTT. Still, such things are related to have happened. Verses 28—35.

What mean thoughts of the infinite God, and what arrogant thoughts of himself, must have possessed the mind of Sennacherib, who doubtless had instructed his servant to speak of him in this style! Surely, if this proud worm had not been intoxicated with success, he must have admitted, that somewhere in the universe there was a power superior to that of mortal man! and if so, it must be highly irrational thus to set at defiance 'all that was called God, or worshipped!' But, by this plasphemy the Lord was expressly engaged in the cause; and his honor required Him to crush the self-important wretch, who dared to exalt himself against Him: so that the greatest kindness imaginable was done to the king and the people of Judah, by this language of impiety and defiance. (19:4, 14—19. v. 19, 25—29. Ps. 79:8—13. Is. 10:15—19.)—Rabshakeh argued very plausibly on his own principles, and his eloquence has been much admired: but when a man addresses himself to an uninformed populace, and has sufficient effrontery, and no reserves as to what he says, be it ever so false, impious, or malignant, provided it is suited to inflame their passions, to excite their fears or terrors, and to set them against the rulers whom God has placed over them; eloquence requires comparatively no great talent. SCOTT.

(31.) Cistern, vine.] Tanks were frequently cut in the solid rock: many of them exist to the present day in those countries. The ancient Egyptians (and probably the Hebrews) generally had one in the centre of their garden, round which, or on one side of which, their house was built. 'Much taste too was frequently displayed in the mode of dressing their vines, which, trained over rafters (as at present in Upper Egypt) supported by low columns, formed a series of shady avenues, and afforded, at the same time, great facility for gathering the ripened clusters.' Wilkinson. Comp. 1 K. 4:25. CHAP. XIX.

Hezekiah in distress sends to desire Isaiah's prayers, and receives an encouraging answer, 1—7. Sennacherib, going to oppose the king of Ethiopia, sends a blasphemous letter to Hezekiah, 8—13. Hezekiah was not thus helpless and defenceless. Three things he supposes Hezekiah might trust to, and endeavors to make out the insufficiency of each.

(1.) His own military preparations; Thou sayest, I have counsel and strength for the war; and so we find he had, 2 Chr. 32: 3. But this Rab-shakeh turns off with a slight, v. 20. With the greatest haughtiness and disdain, he challenges him to produce 2000 men that knew how to manage a horse, and will venture to give him 2000 horses, if he can; he falsely insinuates that he had no men, or none fit to be soldiers; (v. 23.) thus he thinks to run him down with confidence and banter, and will lay him any wager that one captain of the least of his master's servants is able to baffle him and all his forces.

(2.) His alliance with Egypt; he supposes he trusted to Egypt for chariots and horsemen, (v. 24.) because the king of Israel had done so, and of this confidence he truly says, It is a broken reed, v. 21. and will rend the shoulder, as the prophet further illustrates this similitude, with application to Egypt, Ezek. 29: 6, 7. and truly they that trust to any arm of flesh, will find it no better than a broken reed; but God is the Rock of ages.

(3.) His interest in God, and relation to Him; this was indeed the confidence Hezekiah trusted in; (v. 22.) he supported himself by depending on the power and promise of God, v. 30, 32. this, he was sensible, was their great stay, therefore he is most large in his endeavors to shake this, as David's enemies, Ps. 3: 2. 11: 1. and thus did Christ's enemies, Matt. 27: 43. Three things he suggests to discourage their confidence in God, and all false.

[1.] That Hezekiah had forfeited God's protection, by destroying the high places and the altars, v. 22. Here he measures the God of Israel by the gods of the heathen, who delighted [so they thought] in the multitude of altars and temples. But Hezekiah's obliging his people to offer at one altar, is one of the best deeds he ever did; if that be represented by ignorant and malicious men as evil and a provocation to God, which is really good and pleasing to Him, we must not think it strange.

[2.] That God had given orders for the destruction of Jerusalem, at this time, v. 25. This is all an empty boast; but he makes the pretence, to amuse and terrify the people on the wall. It might however be taken from the notice which, perhaps, he had had, by the writings of the prophets, of the hand of God, in the destruction of the 10 tribes, and he thought he had as good a warrant for seizing Jerusalem as Samaria; many that have fought against God, have pretended commissions from Him.

[3.] That if Jehovah, the God of Israel, should undertake to protect them from the king of Assyria, yet He was not able to do it; with this blasphemy he concludes his speech, (v. 33—35.) putting the God of Israel on a level with the gods of the nations whom he had conquered, and concluding that, because they could not defend and deliver their worshippers, the God of Israel could not his. The tradition of the Jews is, that Rab-shakeh was an apostate Jew, [as it was not customary to rend the clothes, (v. 37.) on hearing blasphemy from a mere heathen,] which made him so ready in the Jews' language; if so, his ignorance of the God of Israel was the less excusable, and his enmity the less strange, for apostates are commonly the most bitter and spiteful enemies, witness Julian. A great deal of art and management, it must be owned, there is in his speech, but, withal, a great deal of pride, malice, falsehood, and blasphemy.

Lastly, The commissioners, 1. Held their peace; not for want of something to say both on God's behalf and Hezekiah's, but the king had commanded them not to answer, and they observed their instructions: there are those to whom to offer any thing religious or rational, is to cast pearls before swine. Probably their silence made Rab-shakeh yet more proud and secure, and so his heart was lifted up and hardened to his destruction. 2. They rent their clothes, in detestation of his blasphemy, and in grief for the despised, afflicted condition of Jerusalem, the reproach of which was a burden to them. 3. They faithfully reported the matter to the king.

CHAP. XIX. Jerusalem's great distress we read of in the foregoing ch. and left it besieged, insulted, threatened, terrified, and just ready to be swallowed up. But in this ch. we have an account of its glorious deliverance, not by sword or bow, but by prayer, prophecy, and the hand of an angel.

V. 1—7. The contents of Rab-shakeh's speech being brought to Hezekiah, one would have expected (and it is likely Rab-shakeh did expect) he should have called a council of war, and it should have been debated, whether it was best to capitulate. Before the siege, he had taken counsel with his princes, and his mighty men, (2 Chr. 32: 3.) but that would not do now; his greatest relief is, that he has a God to go to, and here is what passed between him and his God.

I. Hezekiah discovered deep concern at the dishonor done to God by this blasphemy, v. 1. Good men were wont to do so, when they heard of any reproach cast on God's name; and great men must not think it any disparagement to them, to sympathize with the injured honor of the great God. Royal robes are not too good to be rent, nor royal flesh too good to be clothed with sackcloth, in hu-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17—37. No dependence can be placed on the engagements of the covetous or ambitious: and all attempts to purchase their favor, or to soothe them into peace, are vain. Our only safety then consists, in committing our persons, property, connections, reputations, liberty, and every thing we value, into the powerful keeping of our God, in the exercise of faith, and by adhering to the path of duty.—What pride, reproaches, lies, impiety, atheism, and blasphemy have, in all ages, been vented by the tongue, that 'unruly evil,' to the dishonor of God, and the unutterable injury of mankind! We may form some estimate of the desperate wickedness of the human heart, from the horrible language uttered by the lips of men; 'for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.' (Matt. 12:31—37. Jam. 3:3—6.) May the Lord replenish our hearts with his grace, that out of that good treasure we may speak such things, and such only, as may 'minister grace unto the hearers!' Many, because they have succeeded in exposing or seducing hypocritical and degenerate professors of Christianity, triumph as if they had, or soon should, completely ruin the cause of vital godliness: endeavoring to discourage scriptural worshippers, on the most false and preposterous grounds. Such cavils, objections, and arguments have no weight with the established believer: therefore these men pretend to despise him, that they may address the prejudices and passions of the ignorant, unstable, and unthinking multitude, with whom their specious declamations go further, than either solid arguments or scriptural testimonies. But, it is often best to leave persons of this description to rail and blaspheme, without directly answering: because such attempts ordinarily increase their self-importance, and tend to disseminate still more widely the effect of their poisonous tenets; while a decided expression of abhorrence of their guilt, generally forms the best testimony against them. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 2. Isaiah had at this time prophesied almost 50 years, if he entered on that office only a short time before the death of Uzziah: for he prophesied in the days of Uzziah, who died about 758, B. C. and these transactions occurred about 712. (Is. 1:1. 6:1—4, v. 1.) It must be supposed that Hezekiah had often consulted him: and the nature of this message implies a previous acquaintance, and a mutual confidence. (18.4.) Isaiah's visits to Hezekiah, at and after his sickness, are thought by some to have taken place before this, though recorded afterwards: (20:) and many parts of his prophecy evidently refer to these events.—There seems to have been an intended slight on the high priest. Some learned men indeed think, the appointed method of inquiring of God by the high priest, was disused from the time the temple was built: but this can be collected only from the silence of Scripture, as no express declaration to that effect is recorded.—Shebna, who was employed on this occasion, as well as in receiving the message of Rabshakeh, is elsewhere represented in an unfavorable light. (Is. 22:15—19.) Pious persons cannot always employ such characters, and such only, as they approve. SCOTT.

Verse 3.

Are come to the birth, &c.] 'This same expression is still used in the E. when a person has all but accomplished his object, and only a slight obstacle has prevented him.' ROBERTS.

kiah, [h] This day is a day of trouble, and of rebuke, and [*] blasphemy: [i] for the children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring forth.

4 It may be [k] the LORD thy God will hear all the words of Rab-shakeh, [l] whom the king of Assyria his master hath sent to reproach the living God; and will [m] reprove the words which the LORD thy God hath heard: wherefore [n] lift up thy prayer for [o] the remnant that are [†] left.

5 So the servants of king Hezekiah came to Isaiah.

6 And [p] Isaiah said unto them, Thus shall ye say to your master, Thus saith the LORD, [q] Be not afraid of the words which thou hast heard, with which [r] the servants of the king of Assyria have blasphemed me.

7 Behold, I will send [s] a blast upon him, and he shall [t] hear a rumor, and shall return to his own land; and [u] I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land.

8 ¶ So Rabshakeh returned, and found the king of Assyria warring against [x] Libnah: for he had heard that he was departed [y] from Lachish.

9 And [z] when he heard say of Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, Behold, he is come out to fight against thee; [a] he sent messengers again unto Hezekiah, saying,

10 Thus shall ye speak unto Hezekiah king of Judah, saying, [b] Let not thy God in whom thou trustest deceive thee, saying, Jerusalem shall not be miliation for indignities done to God, and for the perils and terrors of his Jerusalem. This, God now called to, and was displeased with those who were not thus affected; Isa. 22: 12—14, 15. which refers to this very event.

II. He went up to the house of the Lord, (according to the example of the Psalmist, Ps. 73: 17.) to meditate and pray, and get his spirit into a sedate, composed frame, after this agitation. He was not considering what answer to return to Rab-shakeh, but refers himself to God, Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me; Herbert. Note, When the church's enemies are very daring and threatening, it is the wisdom and duty of the church's friends to apply themselves to God, appeal to Him, and leave their cause with Him.

III. He sent to the prophet Isaiah, by honorable messengers, in token of great respect, to desire his prayers, v. 2—4. Eliakim and Shebna having heard the words of Rab-shakeh, were the better able both to possess and to affect Isaiah with the case. The elders of the priests were themselves to pray for the people, in the time of trouble, Joel 2: 17. but they must go to engage Isaiah's prayers, because he could pray better, and had a better interest in heaven. The messengers were to go in sackcloth, because they were to represent the king, who was so clothed. Judah was but a remnant now the 10 tribes are gone; Jerusalem but a remnant now the defenced cities of Judah were taken. Note, 1. It is very desirable, and what we should be desirous of when in trouble, to have the prayers of our friends for us. In begging it, we honor God, honor prayer, honor our brethren. 2. Desiring the prayers of others for us, must not excuse us from praying for ourselves. Hezekiah himself went into the house of the Lord, to offer up his own prayers. 3. Those who speak from God to us, we should in a particular manner desire to speak to God for us. He is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee, Gen. 20: 7. The great Prophet is the great Intercessor. 4. Those are likely to prevail with God, that lift up their prayers, that is, that lift up their hearts in prayer. 5. When the interests of God's church are brought very low, so that there is but a remnant left, few friends, and those weak, and at a loss, then it is time to lift up our prayers for that remnant.

Two things are urged, to engage his prayers.

1. Their fears of the enemy, v. 3. 'He is insolent and haughty; it is a day of rebuke and blasphemy, we are despised, God is dishonored; never were such a king and kingdom so trampled on and abused; our soul is exceedingly filled with the contempt of the proud; it is a sword in our bones, to hear them reproach our confidence in God. And, which is worst of all, we see not which way we can help ourselves. Our cause is good, our people are faithful, but we are quite overpowered with numbers; now is the time, the critical moment, when, if ever, we must be relieved; one successful blow would accomplish our wishes. But alas, we are not able to give it; there is not strength to bring forth. Comp. Hos. 13: 13.

2. Their hopes in God. To Him they look, on Him they depend, to appear for them; one word from Him will turn the scale, and save the sinking remnant; if He but reprove the words of Rab-shakeh, i. e. disprove them, (v. 4.) if He undertake to convince and confound the blasphemer, all will be well. And this they trust He will do, not for their merit's sake, but for his own honor's sake, because he has reproached the living God, by levelling Him with dead and dumb idols They have reason to think the issue will be good, for they can interest God in the quarrel, Ps. 74: 22. 'He is the Lord thy God,' say they to Isaiah, 'thine, whose glory thou art concerned for, and whose favor thou art interested in. Help us with thy prayers to bring the cause before Him, and then we are content to leave it with Him.'

IV. God, by Isaiah, sent to Hezekiah, to assure Him he would glorify Himself in the ruin of the Assyrians. Hezekiah sent to Isaiah, not to inquire concerning the event, as many did that sent to the prophets, (Shall I recover? or the like,) but to desire assistance in duty. Therefore God let him know what the event should be, in recompense of his care to do his duty, v. 6,7. He interests Himself in the cause, They have blasphemed Me; He encourages Hezekiah, Be not afraid of the windy words thou hast heard; and He promises to frighten the king of Assyria; I will send a blast upon him, that pestilential breath which killed his army, upon which, terrors shall seize him, and drive him into his own country, where death shall meet him.

V. 8—19. Rab-shakeh, having delivered his message, and received no answer, left his army before Jerusalem, under command of the other generals, and went himself, to attend the king his master for further orders. He found him besieging Libnah, a city that had revolted from Judah, ch. 8: 22. Whether he had taken Lachish or no, is not certain; some think he found it impracticable, v. 8. However, he was now alarmed with the rumor that the king of the Cushites, who bordered on the Arabians, was coming out against him with a great army, v. 9. This made him very desirous to gain Jerusalem with all speed. To take it by force, would cost him more time and men than he could well spare, therefore he renews his attack on Hezekiah, to persuade him tamely to surrender it. Having found him an easy man once, ch. 18: 14. when he said, That which thou puttest on me I will bear, he hoped again to frighten him into a submission, but in vain.

I. Sennacherib sent a railing, blasphemous letter, to the same purport with Rab-shakeh's speech; there is nothing new offered in it. Comp. ch. 18: 29. v. 10—12.

II. Hezekiah was not so haughty, as not to receive the letter, nor so careless as not to read it; nor in such a passion, when he had read it, as to write an answer to it in the same provoking language; delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria.

Verse 7.

A blast, &c.] Some have supposed this expression related to the manner, in which the Assyrian army was destroyed: viz. by exciting one of those scorching winds, [the Samiel or Simoom,] which in those countries have been known to destroy great multitudes almost instantaneously. But this is uncertain: and perhaps it only means, that the Lord would destroy all his prosperity, as easily as the pinching gale of wind blasts the tender vegetables: while the death of his numerous forces, probably attended by a report, that Tirhakah and the Ethiopians were marching to assault him, as a terrifying rumor in his ears, would hurry him home with dismay and disgrace. (35—37. Job 20: 10—29, vv. 23—26.)—As the word, rendered blast, is often translated spirit; some explain the expression to mean, that God would send an angel, or spirit, to destroy Sennacherib's army; but others think it signifies, that God would fill his heart with terror by some supernatural agent. 'I will infuse a spirit into him.'—The phrase 'never signifies any thing, but putting a spirit into a person; this was pneuma deilias,' (a spirit of fear.) Secker, in Lowth. SCOTT.

Verse 8.

It is probable, Rabshakeh marched the army back from Jerusalem to join Sennacherib, when he found Hezekiah would neither surrender, nor return any answer to his insulting message. (23) For Jerusalem was so advantageously situated, and so well fortified, that, with a moderate garrison, it might have made a stout resistance against any detachment of the Assyrian army: (25:1—5. 2 Sam. 5:6—8. Ps. 48:12, 13. 125:2. Lam. 4:12.) though it must probably at length have shared the fate of Samaria, if the Lord had not immediately interposed. The siege, however, was postponed, or not carried on with vigor, till Sennacherib had leisure to come against it in person. ID.

Verses 9—13.

When Sennacherib had, the first time, levied contributions on Hezekiah, he marched his army into Egypt; probably in resentment against the king, for forming alliances with the vassals of the Assyrians, as he regarded the Jews and the Samaritans to be. After several successes

14 And [i] Hezekiah received the letter of the hand of the messengers, and read it: and Hezekiah went up into the house of the LORD, and [k] spread it before the LORD.

15 And Hezekiah [l] prayed before the LORD, and said, [m] O LORD God of Israel, which [n] dwellest between the cherubims, [o] thou art the God, even thou alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth; [p] thou hast made heaven and earth.

16 LORD, [q] bow down thine ear, and hear: [r] open, LORD, thine eyes, and see: and hear the words of Sennacherib, [s] which hath sent him to reproach the living God.

17 [t] Of a truth, LORD, [u] the kings of Assyria have destroyed the nations and the lands, 18 And [v] have [*] cast their gods into the fire: [x] for they were no gods, but the work of men's hands, wood and stone: therefore they have destroyed them.

19 Now therefore, [y] O LORD our God, I beseech thee, save thou us out of his hand, that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art the LORD God, even thou only.

but he immediately went up to the temple, presented himself, and then spread the letter before the Lord, v. 14. Not as if God needed to have letters showed Him, but hereby he signified that he acknowledged God in all his ways, desired not to aggravate the injuries his enemies did him, or to make them appear worse than they were, but desired they might be set in a true light; and that he referred himself to God, and his righteous judgment, on the whole matter. Hereby likewise he would affect himself in the prayer he came to the temple to make; and we have need of all possible helps to quicken us in that duty. In his prayer,

1. He adores the God whom Sennacherib had blasphemed; (v. 15.) calls Him the God of Israel, because Israel was his peculiar people; and the God that dwelt between the cherubims, because there was the peculiar residence of his glory on earth; but gives glory to Him as the God of the whole earth, and not as Sennacherib fancied Him to be, the God of Israel only, and confined to the temple.

2. He appeals to God concerning the insolence and profaneness of Sennacherib, v. 16. 'Lord, hear; Lord, see. Here it is under his own hand.' Had Hezekiah only been abused, he would have passed it by; but it is God, the living God, that is reproached, the jealous God. Lord, what wilt Thou do for thy great name?

3. He owns Sennacherib's triumphs over the gods of the heathen, but distinguishes between them and the God of Israel, v. 17, 18. Ps. 115: 3, 4.

4. He prays that God would now glorify Himself in the defeat of Sennacherib, and the deliverance of Jerusalem, v. 19. If we be conquered, as other lands are, they will say that Thou art conquered, as the gods of those lands were: but, Lord, distinguish Thyself, by distinguishing us, and let all the world know, and be made to confess, that Thou art the Lord God, the self-existent, sovereign God, even Thou only, and that all pretenders are vanity and a lie.' Note, The best pleas in prayer are those which are taken from God's honor; therefore, the Lord's prayer begins with Hallowed be thy name, and concludes with Thine is the glory.

V. 20—34. We have here the gracious, copious answer God gave Hezekiah. The message He sent him by the same hand, v. 6, 7. one would think, had been sufficient; but, that he might have strong consolation, he is encouraged by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie. In general, God assures him his prayer was heard, v. 20. Note, The case of those is miserable, that have the prayers of God's people against them. If the oppressed cry to God against the oppressor, He will hear, Ex. 22: 23. God hears and answers; hears with the saving strength of his right hand. This message speaks two things:

I. Confusion and shame to Sennacherib and his forces. Not that this message was sent him, but what is here said to him he was made to know by the event; Providence spake it to him with a witness; and perhaps his own heart was made to whisper it; for God has more ways than one of speaking to sinners in his wrath, so as to vex them in his sore displeasure. Sennacherib is here represented,

1. As the scorn of Jerusalem, v. 21. He thought himself the terror of the daughter of Zion, that chaste and beautiful virgin, and that by his threats he could force her to submit to him; But, being a virgin in her Father's house, and under his protection, she defies thee, despises thee, laughs thee to scorn. By this word God intended to silence the fears of Hezekiah and his people.

2. As an enemy to God; and that was enough to make him miserable. Hezekiah pleaded this; 'Lord, he has reproached Thee,' v. 16. 'He has,' saith God, 'and I take it as against Myself,' v. 22. Whom hast thou reproached? The Holy One of Israel!

3. As a proud, vain-glorious fool, that spake great swelling words of vanity, and boasted of a false gift; by his boasts, as well as by his threats, reproaching the Lord, v 23, 24. This was not in the letter he wrote, but God lets Hezekiah know that He not only saw what was written there, but heard what he said elsewhere, probably in his speeches to his councils or armies. Note, God notices the boasts of proud men, and will call them to an account, that he may look upon them, and abase them, Job 40: 11. He took to himself the glory of doing these great things, whereas they were all the Lord's doing, v. 25, 26. Sennacherib, in his letter, had appealed to what Hezekiah had heard, v. 11, what the kings of Assyria had done; but, in answer, he is reminded of what God had done for Israel of old, drying up the Red Sea, leading them through the wilderness, planting them in Canaan. Sennacherib's boasts are expounded, Isa. 10: 13, 14. By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom, &c. and they are answered, v. 15. Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith? How absurd for the fly on the wheel to say, What a dust I make! Or for the sword in the hand to say, What execution I do! If God be the principal Agent in all that is done, boasting is for ever excluded.

4. As under the check and rebuke of that God whom he blasphemed. All his motions were, (1.) Under the divine cognizance, v. 27. God was as a constant spy on him 2 Chr. 16: 9. (2.) Under the divine control, v. 28. Note, It is a great comfort to all the church's friends, that God has a hook in the nose, and a bridle in the jaws, of all her enemies; can make even their wrath to serve and praise Him, and then restrain the remainder of it; Here shall its proud waves be staid.

there, while besieging Pelusium, an important fortress in that country, he heard that Tirhakah king of Ethiopia was marching against him with a great army: and, not choosing to wait his approach, he raised the siege; and, returning into Judea, began to commit hostilities there, as it has been before related. But, finding that Tirhakah pursued him as a fugitive, he marched back to encounter him; and, having totally routed his army, he returned to wreak his vengeance on Hezekiah and Jerusalem. This gave the Jews some respite for preparation and for prayer; and afforded Sennacherib an occasion for more deliberately uttering his blasphemies, by a letter sent to Hezekiah, when detained for a time from marching against him.—Learned men differ in opinion concerning Tirhakah; whether he were king of Ethiopia, or Cush, to the south of Egypt in Africa, or of the Cushites in Asia. He was, however, an ally of the king of Egypt. (M. R.—18 20, 21, 28—35. 1 K. 10:1, 2.) SCOTT.

ple. This shall be a sign to them of God's favor.

1. Provisions were scarce and dear; and what should they do for food? The fruits of the earth were devoured by the Assyrian army, Isa. 32: 9, 10, &c. Why, they shall not only dwell in the land, but verily they shall be fed. But the next year was the sabbatical year, when the land was to rest, and they must neither sow nor reap. What must they do that year? Why, The Lord will provide; God's blessing shall save them seed and labor, and, that year too, the voluntary productions of the earth shall serve to maintain them, to remind them that the earth brought forth before there was a man to till it, Gen. 1: 11. And then, the third year, their husbandry would return into its former channel, and they should sow and reap as they used to do.

2. The country was laid waste, families broken up and scattered, and all in confusion; how should it be otherwise, when overrun by such an army? As to this, it is promised that the remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah, i. e. of the country people, shall yet again be planted in their own habitations, on their own estates, v. 30. See how their prosperity is described; it is taking root downward, and bearing fruit upward, being well fixed, and well provided for, themselves, and then doing good to others. Such is the prosperity of the soul; it is taking root downward by faith in Christ, and then being fruitful in fruits of righteousness.

3. The city was shut up, none went out or came in; but now the remnant in Jerusalem and Zion shall go forth freely, and there shall be none to

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—22. In times of great distress and prevailing impiety, strong expressions of poignant sorrow and deep humiliation are peculiarly seasonable: for 'the LORD calls to weeping, and mourning, and girding with sackcloth,' and the contrary spirit and conduct are irrational, offensive, and tokens of a profane, sensual, and selfish heart. (Is. 22:8—14.)—They, who best know the efficacy of fervent, believing prayer, will most desire the supplications of others for them; and especially of those, who have long been eminent for piety and simplicity, and zealous for the glory of God. Alas! few kings are very earnest to form alliances with the faithful and devoted ministers of religion, against their hostile invaders; yet they are of more real utility, than increasing numbers of brave and disciplined troops: and whenever princes, prophets, and people unite in prayer, in real dependence on God, and a disposition to give Him the praise; a prosperous event may be confidently expected, notwithstanding their own weakness, and the rebukes and insults of haughty enemies.—The more we are humbly conscious, that we cannot help ourselves, but must be miserable and perish without God's aid; the more simple will be our dependence on Him, and the more fervent our applications to Him, whether in temporal or spiritual exigences.—The Lord finds wicked men other employment, when He would give his servants a respite from conflict and persecution. Absurd as it appears, worldly men do really think, that those who trust in God will be deceived; and they presume on success, while they despise Him, and set Him at defiance! Impunity and prosperity inspire confidence and arrogance.

We can easily say, 'If God be for us, who can be against us?'

LORD almighty, able to save and to destroy. Sennacherib's blasphemous challenge gave a fair opportunity of publicly demonstrating this most important truth: and a plea grounded so directly on the honor of God could not but prevail. Verse 21.

The virgin, &c.] (M. R. c.) Perhaps the term, virgin, might refer to the state of Jerusalem, as free from idolatry, and reserved for the Lord alone; (2 Cor. 11:1—6, v. 2.) or as having never been exposed to the ravages of an enraged victor. (Notes, Is. 23:12. 47:1—3.) The city of David, or Zion, seems never to have been taken by any assailant, from the time when David got possession of it, till the Babylonish captivity.—The former part of this message is addressed, not to Hezekiah, but to Sennacherib, as if present; first by the daughter of Zion, and then by the Lord Himself. ID.

The Daughter.] '"The people." Cities are often called mothers, and the inhabitants daughters. See 2 Sam. 20:19. Num. 21 25. Josh. 17:16. Judg. 1:27, &c.' POOLE.

Verse 23.

The Assyrian monarch is here introduced as glorying in what he had done, and would do. Some suppose he meant, that he had marched his army through the defiles, or over the craggy summits, of mount Lebanon: but others think that by these expressions, the temple on mount Zion is intended; and that he gloried, as already indisputably master of the whole land; and as if he had marched his army, and driven his chariots, into the mountain of the Lord's house, and dispossessed Him of his habitation. The temple may be called Lebanon, either because difficult of access, or because it was built with cedars of Lebanon: the removal of all obstructions, by slaying the bravest of Hezekiah's captains, may be denoted, by cutting down the cedars and choice fir-trees: and, 'the lodgings of his borders, and the forest of his Carmel,' may mean the strong-holds on the borders of the land; and the fruitful fields, which would come into the possession of the conqueror. For Carmel being situated in a very fruitful part of the land, every fruitful spot seems to have been called by that name. (M.—Notes, Is. 10:12—15.) SCOTT.

Cut down the tall cedar-trees of Lebanon.] 'Of these noble trees, with forests of which Lebanon was covered, the most recent travellers find but some half dozen remaining, of very great size—and about 389 [Fisk] in all the grove, (which is about three fourths of a mile in circumference,) on the sides of Mt. Lebanon, above Byblos and Tripoli, E. They are remarkably thick and tall, some among them are from 35 to 40 ft. in girth. At 10 or 12 ft. from the ground,—it shoots out branches, [horizontally, and the delicate foliage, much resembling the larch or hackmetack, is so arranged upon the branches as to form vast horizontal sheets of verdure, of a foot and less in thickness, and scores of square feet in extent,] the branches are large and distant; its leaves are ever-green, and something like those of rosemary; the fruit [small cones like those of the pine, in miniature] hangs underneath; Cedar wood is reputed incorruptible; it is beautiful, solid, free from knots, and inclining to a red brown color.' Fisk and King (the missionaries) say, 'the largest of those remaining in 1833, is upwards of 40 ft. in circumference. The handsomest and tallest are those of 2 or 3 ft. in diameter, the body straight, the branches almost horizontal, forming a beautiful cone, and casting a goodly shade. We measured 12 by the shade, and found each about 90 ft. some are a little higher. There is a regular gradation in size, from the largest down to the merest sapling.' See Rob. Calm. ED.

Hezekiah had before taken measures to prevent the Assyrians from finding water near Jerusalem. (2 Chr. 32:3, 4.) But this haughty conqueror boasted, that wherever his armies marched to besiege cities, that by digging deep wells he found water where none had ever been found before, so that he and his army had 'drunk strange waters.'—The cities of Egypt, where Sennacherib had been very successful, were chiefly defended by rivers or deep moats. SCOTT.

Of besieged places.] Heb. mtsor. Bochart transl. of Egypt. Harmer paraphrases thus, 'I have digged channels and drunk, and caused my army to drink out of new made rivers, into which I have conducted the waters that used to flow elsewhere; and have laid these old channels dry with the sole of my foot; i. e. with as much ease as a gardener digs channels in his garden, and, directing the waters of a cistern into a new rill, stops up with his foot [note, Deut. 11:10] that in which it ran before—an evident allusion to the eastern mode of watering gardens.' PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

but in the crisis of danger, when the eye of sense perceives no way of escape, without removing mountains, and effecting apparent impossibilities, faith is constrained to maintain a severe conflict against unbelief, even in the experience of the most established believers. But prayer is the never-failing resource of the tempted Christian; whether he be called to struggle with outward difficulties, or to engage in the more distressing warfare with his inward enemies.— No weapon that is formed against the church can prosper: and the daughter of Zion, whilst untainted with idolatry or hypocrisy, and faithfully reserving herself for Him, who has 'espoused her in righteousness, and faithfulness, and loving kindness,' may despise and defy the feeble efforts of all assailants, and confidently predict their speedy and terrible destruction. Oh that such would consider, 'whom they have reproached and blasphemed!' SCOTT.

Hook.] Still in the E. 'a person says of his deliverer from prison, or danger, "Ah! the good man took me out by his tote," i. e. hook. A culprit says of the officers who cannot catch him, "Their hooks are become straight." The man who cannot drag another from his secrecy, says, "My hook is not sufficient for that fellow."' Roberts. It is curious that the word tote (hook) is still in use in the United States, especially at the S. in the sense of to lug, drag, &c. Roberts says also of the phrase 'of small power,' v. 26. (Heb. 'short of hand,') 'Of feeble people it is still said in the E. "they have short hands."' Some commentators refer the phrase 'hook in thy nose,' to the method of leading bulls, &c. by a ring in the nose. ED.

Verse 29.

The Lord here addresses Hezekiah.—The devastations of the Assyrians had, probably, prevented the land from being sown that year; and the next is supposed to have been the sabbatical year; though this is the only intimation, in all the history of Israel, that any regard was paid to that institution: (2 Chr. 36: 21.) but the Lord here engaged, that the spontaneous produce of the land, from the corn shaken out, in gathering the preceding harvest, should be sufficient for the support of the people, during those two years, and till a supply was obtained in the ordinary way. (Lev. 25:20—22.) As the performance of this promise was evidently subsequent to the destruction of Sennacherib's army, it was a sign to Hezekiah's faith, that the present deliverance would be an earnest of the Lord's persevering care of the kingdom of Judah; and of the accomplishment of that part of the promise, which related to events still more remote. It is certain from these vs. that Sennacherib never approached near enough to Jerusalem, to lay siege against it, or even to make preparations for a siege: and there is no proof that Rabshakeh or Rabsaris had proceeded to besiege the city; though they had come with an army and menaced it. CHAP. XX.

Hezekiah, when sick, is warned by Isaiah to prepare for death, 1; but praying, he receives the promise of fifteen years added to his life, and of deliverance from the Assyrians, 2—7. In confirmation, the shadow on Ahaz's dial goes back ten degrees, 8—11. The king of Babylon sends to congratulate Hezekiah, who shows the ambassadors all his treasures, 12, 13. Isaiah reproves him for this, and foretells the Babylonish captivity, 14—19. Hezekiah dies, and is succeeded by Manasseh, 20, 21.

IN those days [a] was Hezekiah sick unto death. And [b] the prophet Isaiah the son of Amoz came to him, and said unto him, thus saith the LORD, † set thine house in order; for [c] thou shalt die, and not live.

2 Then [d] he turned his face to the wall, and prayed unto the LORD, saying,

3 I beseech thee, O LORD, [e] remember now [f] I have walked before thee [g] in truth, God, whom therefore he ought to worship; yet he persists in his idolatry, and seeks to his false god for protection against a God of irresistible power. Justly is his blood mingled with his sacrifices, who will not be convinced, by such a plain and dear-bought demonstration, of his folly in worshipping idols.

His sons that murdered him were suffered to escape, and no pursuit made after them; his subjects perhaps being weary of the government of so proud a man, and thinking themselves well rid of him. And his sons would be looked upon as the more excusable in what they had done, if it be true (as Bp. Patrick suggests) that he was now vowing to sacrifice them to his god, so that it was for their own preservation that they sacrificed him. His successor was another son, Esar-haddon, who (as it should seem) did not aim, like his father, to enlarge his conquests, but rather to improve them; for he it was that first sent colonies of Assyrians to inhabit the country of Samaria, though it is mentioned before, ch. 17: 24. as appears, Ezra 4: 2. where the Samaritans say it was Esar-haddon that brought them thither.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—11. I. Here is Hezekiah's sickness. In those days, i. e. in the year the king of Assyria besieged Jerusalem, for he reigning, in all, 29 years, and surviving this, 15, this must be in his 14th year, and so was that, ch. 18: 13. Some think it was at the time the Assyrian army was besieging the city, or preparing for it, because God promises, v. 6, I will defend the city, which promise was afterwards repeated, when the danger came to be most imminent, ch. 19: 34. Others think it was soon after the defeat of Sennacherib; and then it shows us the uncertainty of all our comforts in this world: we must therefore always rejoice with trembling. It seems he was sick of the plague, for we read of the boil or plague-sore, v. 7. The same disease which was killing to the Assyrians, was trying to him. Neither greatness nor goodness can exempt from sickness.

II. Warning brought him to prepare for death, by Isaiah. He tells him that, if not recovered by a miracle of mercy, he must certainly die; and that therefore he must, with all speed, get ready for death; this we should feel highly concerned to do, when in health, but are most loudly called to do, when sick; set the heart in order by renewed acts of repentance, and faith, and resignation to God, with cheerful farewells to this world, and welcomes to another; and if it be not done before, (which is the best and wisest course,) set the house in order, make thy will, settle thy estate, put thine affairs in the best posture thou canst, for the ease of those that shall come after thee. Isaiah speaks not to Hezekiah of his kingdom, only of his house; David, being a prophet, had authority to appoint who should reign after him, but other kings did not pretend to bequeath their crowns as part of their goods and chattels.*

III. His prayer, v. 2. Is any sick? Let him be prayed for, prayed with, and let him pray. Hezekiah had found in the foregoing ch. that the prayers of faith bring answers of peace; therefore will he call upon God as long as he lives. Happy returns of prayer are engagements and encouragements to continue instant in prayer; he had now received the sentence of death within himself, and, 1. If it were reversible, it must be reversed by prayer. When God purposes mercy, He will, for this, be inquired of, Ezek. 36: 37. We have not, if we ask not, or ask amiss. 2. If not, prayer is one of the best preparations for death, because by it we fetch in strength and grace from God to enable us to finish well. Observe,

(1.) The circumstances of this prayer, 1. He turned his face to the wall, probably, as he lay in his bed; this he did, perhaps, for privacy; when we cannot be so private as we would, in our devotions, nor perform them with the usual outward expressions of reverence and solemnity, yet we must not therefore omit them, but compose ourselves to them as well as we can; or, as some think, he turned his face toward the temple, to show how willingly he would have gone up thither, to pray this prayer, (as he did, ch. 19: 1, 14.) if able; and remembering what encouragements were given to all prayers made in or toward that house. Christ is our Temple; to Him we must have an eye in all our prayers, for no man, no service, comes to the Father but by Him. 2. He wept sore; some gather hence that he was unwilling to die; it is in the nature of man to have some dread of the separation of soul and body, and it was not strange, if the O. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 23—37. The greatest exploits of men are unworthy of notice, compared with the most ordinary works of God: the most powerful and successful of his enemies undesignedly accomplish his secret purposes, or express predictions; and prosper, only till they have filled up their part of his universal plan. Some the Lord employs, contrary to their own intentions, as executioners of his vengeance; but his believing people, safe under his protection, and living on his grace and providential bounty, are employed as willing instruments to perform his works of goodness and mercy, which when finished shall meet a sure reward.—The cause of God, however reduced, will surely revive: the remnant of every generation will yield an increase to that which succeeds; and at length 'Israel shall blossom, and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit.' The zeal of the Lord of hosts, which appointed and sent the mighty Savior, is engaged to make his salvation triumphant over all opposers, and to fill the earth with the knowledge of his glory. May our hearts be prepared, as good ground, that his Word may strike root in them, and bring forth fruit in our lives! SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1. (18:13.)—It is not likely, all the events recorded in the two preceding chapters occurred within a part of one year; yet, this must have been the case, if Hezekiah's sickness was subsequent to the destruction of the Assyrian army. (Notes, 2 Chr. 32:24—26. Is. 38:6.)—The prophet spoke according to the natural tendency of the disorder, and not according to the Lord's secret purposes. Hezekiah's prayer showed, that he did not consider the sentence to be irreversible. ID.

Verse 3.

Hezekiah doubtless was very unwilling to die at that time. To account for this, it has been said, that believers under the O. T. having dark views of the eternal world, might be expected to die with more regret, than those under the New: but facts by no means support this supposition; for Abraham, Jacob, Aaron, Moses, Joshua, David, and others, seem to have left the world with as much joyfulness, as Paul himself. We must, therefore, ascribe Hezekiah's reluctance to die, either to the state of his mind, or to the circumstances of his family and the nation. Nothing appears peculiarly to have distressed him, in the view of immediate death, as to the state of his own soul. But the circumstances of his family, and the state of affairs in Israel seem to solve all the difficulty. The Lord knew, and Hezekiah could appeal to Him, that he had walked before Him in sincerity and uprightness of heart; having used all his authority and influence, with zeal and earnestness, to suppress idolatry and wickedness, and by every scriptural mean to promote the worship and service of God; and that he had done what was good in his sight, being an example to his people. The consciousness of his integrity gave him confidence; and he begged the Lord to remember the fruits of grace which had been produced, and to spare him, that he might be yet more fruitful and useful 2 Chr. 30:23—27. 31:20, 21. Neh. 13:14, 31. 2 Cor. 1:12—14.) 6 And [r] I will add unto thy days fifteen years; and I will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria; and [s] I will defend this city for mine own sake, and for my servant David's sake.

7 And Isaiah said, [t] Take a lump of figs: and they took and laid it on the boil, and he recovered.

8 And Hezekiah said unto Isaiah, [u] What shall be the sign that the LORD will heal me, and that I shall go up into the house of the LORD the third day?

9 And Isaiah said, [x] This sign shalt thou have of the LORD, that the LORD will do the thing that he hath spoken: shall the shadow go forward ten degrees or go back ten degrees?

10 And Hezekiah answered, [y] It is a light thing for the shadow to go down ten degrees: nay, but let the shadow return backward ten degrees.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. If the Lord seem in his providence to command us 'to set our house in order, for we must die,' and yet afterwards unexpectedly prolong our days; our preparation in that case will neither mar the comfort, nor lessen the usefulness, of our future lives.—It is frequently required of ministers, to intimate to sick persons the probability, or supposed certainty, of their approaching dissolution; as well as to assist them in improving the visitation, and in preparing for the event: and should such intimations afterwards prove erroneous, they ought not to be censured; for they can only speak according to their judgment, and deliver that message from God, which appears to them suited to the case of those whom they address. [Still, as the influence of fear, &c. is so great upon the bodily state of the patient, much judgment is requisite herein: and great knowledge (alas, that there is such neglect here) of God's natural laws.] Though miracles, properly so called, have ceased; yet the Lord hears the prayer of faith for the sick, and sometimes remarkably prospers simple means, used in dependence on his blessing.—There may be cases, in which men may with propriety be importunate for the continuance of life and health, in order to complete designs of public and allowed utility, which appear likely to be frustrated if they should be removed; or when in any way the important interests of families, churches, or nations appear to them connected with their lives. Yet, as we are all liable to mistake in these concerns, submission to the Divine Will ought invariably to be united with such petitions:—The mercy of our God, and the merits of our heavenly Advocate, form the sinner's never-failing plea at the throne of grace: yet the consciousness of sincerity, in our professed faith and piety, gives confidence in times of trial; and may, on some occasions, be pleaded before Him, without the imputation of pride or self-righteousness.—Secret, earnest prayer is the approved and successful method of obtaining relief in the deepest distress. If we would have promised mercies, we must observe the instituted means; for these, being connected with the end by the express promises of God, are far more certainly efficacious, when used properly, than any of those means which produce their effect in the ordinary course of providence [according to the natural laws]: and yet, the latter ought [by no means] to be neglected, lest we tempt rather than trust the Lord.—Recovery from sickness should always be publicly acknowledged, by first 'going up to the house of the LORD,' to render the sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving, if it can be done: yet alas! few observe this rule, and many of those few do it as a formal task; while reestablished health is employed in scenes of diversion or business, if not more directly devoted to the service of Satan by licentious pleasures. (Luke 17:11—19.)—True faith is not without its misgivings, so that the strongest believers desire to have theirs more strengthened: and in their experience, the Lord is pleased sometimes to give those evidences of his power, truth, and love to them, which establish their hearts as effectually as miraculous signs did of old. SCOTT.

'Hezekiah pleads his uprightness and holy conduct in his own behalf. Was it impious to do so? No; but it certainly did not savor much either of humility, or of a due sense of his own weakness. If he had a perfect heart, who made it such?—God. If he did good in God's sight, who enabled him to do so?—God. Could he, therefore, plead in his behalf dispositions and actions which he could neither have felt nor practised, but by the power of the grace of God? I trow not. But the times of this ignorance God winked at. The Gospel teaches us a different lesson.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

says and unsays; but, on Hezekiah's prayer, which He foresaw, and which his Spirit inclined him to, God did for him, what otherwise He would not have done. God here calls Hezekiah the captain of his people, to intimate that he would reprieve him for his people's sake, because, in this time of war, they could ill spare such a captain: He calls Himself the God of David, to intimate that He would reprieve him, out of a regard to the covenant with David, and the promise always to ordain a lamp for him.

In this answer, 1. God honors his prayers by the notice He takes of them, and the reference he has to them in this message, I have heard thy prayers, I have seen thy tears; prayers that have much life and affection in them, are, in a special manner, pleasing to God. 2. God exceeds his prayers; he only begged God would remember his integrity, but God here promises, (1.) To recover him from his illness, I will heal thee. (2.) To restore him to such a degree of health, that, on the third day, he should go up to the house of the Lord, to return thanks: because nothing would please him better, he promises him this; Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee; the man whom Christ healed, was, soon after, found in the temple, John 5: 14. V. The means to be used for his recovery, v. 7. Isaiah ordered an outward application, a very cheap and common thing; this might contribute something to the cure, and yet, considering to what a height the disease was come, and how suddenly it was checked, the cure was no less than miraculous.

VI. The sign given for the encouragement of his faith. He begged it, not in any distrust of the power or promise of God, but because he looked on the things promised to be very great things, and worthy to be so confirmed, and because it had been usual with God thus to glorify Himself, and favor his people; and he remembered how much God was displeased with his father for refusing to ask a sign, Isa. 7: 10—12. Observe, Hezekiah desired to recover, that he might glorify God in the gates of the daughter of Zion. It is not worth while to live for any other purpose than to serve God. It was put to his choice, whether the sun should go back or forward, but the more seemingly difficult of the two would be the more likely to confirm his faith; perhaps, to this Isa. 45: 11. may refer, Ask me of things to come concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my hands command ye me. It is supposed the degrees were half hours, and that it was just noon when the proposal was made, and the question is, 'Shall the sun go back to its place at seven in the morning, or forward to its place at five in the evening?' He humbly desired the sun might go back, which would seem more strange, and more significant of Hezekiah's returning to the days of his youth, (Job 33: 25.) and the lengthening out of his life. It was accordingly done, on the prayer of Isaiah, v. 11. It is likely, he could see the shadow on the dial through his chamber window: and the same was observed on all other dials, even in Babylon, 2 Chr. 32: 31. Whether this retrograde motion of the sun was gradual, or sudden; or whether, after a little while, it was restored again to its usual place, so that no change was made in the state of the heavenly bodies, (so Patrick,) we are not told: but this work of wonder shows the power of God in heaven as well as on earth, his great notice of prayer, and favor to his chosen. The most plausible idolatry of the heathen was theirs that worshipped the sun; by this it appeared that their god was under the check of the God of Israel. Lightfoot suggests that the 15 songs of degrees, Ps. 120, &c. might, perhaps, be so called, because selected by Hezekiah to be sung to his stringed instruments, Isa. 38: 20. in remembrance of the degrees on the dial which the sun went back, and the 15 years added to his life; and he observes how much of these psalms is applicable to Jerusalem's distress and deliverance, and Hezekiah's sickness and recovery.

V. 12—27. Here is,

I. An embassy from the king of Babylon, to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery, v. 12. The kings of Babylon had hitherto been only deputies and tributaries to the kings of Assyria, and Nineveh was the royal city: we find Babylon subject to the king of Assyria, ch. 17: 24. But this king of Babylon began to set up for himself, and, by degress, things were so changed, that Assyria became subject to the kings of Babylon.* This king of Babylon sent to compliment Hezekiah, and ingratiate himself with him on a double account. 1. On account of religion. The Babylonians worshipped the sun, and, perceiving how their god had honored Hezekiah, in going back for his sake, they thought themselves obliged to honor him likewise. 2. On account of civil interest. If the king of Babylon was now meditating a revolt from the king of Assyria, it was policy to get Hezekiah into his interest, in answer to whose prayers, and for whose protection, Heaven had given that fatal blow to the king of Assyria. He found himself obliged to Hezekiah, and his God, for the weakening of the Assyrian forces, and had reason to think he could not have a more powerful and valuable ally, than one that had so good an interest in the upper world. He therefore made his court to him with all possible respect, by ambassadors, letters, and a present.

sun's rays, by means of a layer of condensed air. See diss. and diagram in Dr. A. Clarke. But why is a ray of light bent in passing from a rarer to a denser medium? Such are 'the laws of optics.' Why do these consequents 'invariably' follow these antecedents, i. e. why do these laws exist? Alas! our boasted science but explains the mystery, by repeating it in other words. The laws of optics exist because God has willed those relations of light, which we name laws. Then why not explain the miracle as the scripture does, 'God willed it'? Can we lessen the miracle by multiplying scientific terms! Or shall we believe the laws of optics are something distinct and aside from the will of Him by whom all things stand! Some people seem to think the Omnipresent has set the world agoing, like some vast piece of machinery, and stands aside, as it were, a spectator, or forgetful of his work; but Scripture tells us, 'in Him we live and move and have our being.' Father, glorify Thyself in us! ED.

Verses 12, 13.

The king of Babylon, knowing that Hezekiah had refused submission to the Assyrians, seems to have proposed to enter into a confederacy with him against that potent nation, 'and Hezekiah hearkened unto them,' and, in order to convince the ambassadors, that he was a desirable ally, he showed them all his treasures, and armor, and preparations for war of every kind: from pride and ostentation. He seems likewise to have missed the opportunity of instructing the Chaldeans concerning the perfections, &c. of JEHOVAH, who had wrought the miracles which had excited their attention. Though Hezekiah's sickness preceded Sennacherib's invasion and overthrow, it is probable this embassy arrived after that event; when Hezekiah's exhausted treasuries had been abundantly replenished by the spoil of the Assyrians. 'The treasure of precious stones, plates of gold, &c. belonging to the king of Calicut, were heaped together by 12 kings, and would fill two large ware houses.' Vertomannus, in Burder. From the greater prevalence of common-sense, and the greater security of property, modern princes, especially European, prefer to double their wealth by trade, &c. rather than to let it lie thus rusty and dead. Yet still, in every nation, how much more treasure is lavished, in providing for the gratification of this childish and miserable vanity of Hezekiah, than is spent in National Education. If the treasure lavished by Solomon, in his rage for building, amassed by Hezekiah to glut Babylonish cupidity, or profligately squandered at Rome, Versailles, Madrid, London, &c. had been wisely expended for the great object of existence, the education of the intellectual and moral nature, how much farther would the world be advanced in happiness! May the exhaustless resources of our own unbounded national prosperity ever be used to this end, and no other. Thus shall we as a nation best glorify God, in obedience to his laws, and escape that captivity to selfish and hurtful lusts, into which every nation before us has been led sooner or later. ED.

Verses 14. 15.

Hezekiah did not resent the prophet's interference in state-affairs; (2 Chr. 16:7—10. 25:14—16.) for he reverenced his person, confided in

II. The kind entertainment Hezekiah gave to these ambassadors, v. 13. It was his duty to be civil to them, and receive them with the respect due to ambassadors; but he exceeded, and did it to a fault. Though idolaters, yet he became intimate with them, was forward to come into a confederacy with their king, and granted them all they came for. He was more open and free than he should have been, and not so much on his guard. What reason had he that was in covenant with God, so eagerly to catch at an alliance with a heathen prince, or to value himself at all on his respectful notice? What honor could this embassy add to one whom God had so highly favored, that he should please himself so much with it? 2. He was too fond of showing them his palace, his treasures, and his magazines, that they might see, and report to their master, what a great king he was, and how well worthy of the honor done him. It is not said he showed them the temple, the book of the law, and the manner of his worship, that he might proselyte them to the true religion, which he had now a fair opportunity of doing; but, in compliment, lest it should affront, he waved that, and showed them the rich furniture of his closet, that house of his precious things, the wealth he had heaped up since the king of Assyria had emptied his coffers. And what harm in this? What is more commonly, and (as we think) more innocently, done, than to show strangers the riches and rarities of a country?—to show our friends our houses and their furniture, our gardens, stables, and libraries? But if we do this in the pride of our hearts, as Hezekiah, to gain applause from men, and not giving praise to God, it turns into sin to us, as to him.

III. The examination of Hezekiah concerning this matter, v. 14, 15. Isaiah, who had often been his comforter, is now his reprover. The blessed Spirit is both, John 16: 7, 8. Ministers must be both, as there is occasion. Isaiah spake in God's name, therefore called him to account as one having authority. Hezekiah not only submitted to the examination, but made an ingenuous confession. I hope Hezekiah had the same value for Isaiah now, that he had in his distress; but it had become him to show it, by bringing these ambassadors to him in the first place, which might have prevented this false step.

IV. The sentence passed for his pride, vanity, and too great relish of the things of the world, after that intimate acquaintance he had so lately been admitted to with divine things, v. 17, 18. It is just with God, to take that from us, which we make the matter of our pride, and in which we put our confidence. Not that it was for this sin, that the judgment should be brought on them: the sins of Manasseh, his idolatries and murders, were the cause of that calamity; but it is now foretold to Hezekiah, to convince him of the folly of his pride, and value for the king of Babylon, and to make him ashamed of it. It was fulfilled, Dan. 1: 1, &c. Hezekiah could not have been more mortified than by such a thought. Babylon will be the ruin of those that are fond of Babylon. Wise therefore and happy are they that come out from her, Rev. 18: 4.

V. Hezekiah's humble and patient submission to this sentence, v. 19. Observe how he argues himself into this submission. Good is the word of the Lord, even this threatening word, for every word of his is so; not only just and good, but He will bring good out of it: we should believe this of every providence, that it is good, is working for good. He notices that he should not live to see this evil, much less to share in it. He makes the best of the bad; 'Certainly, it is better than I deserve.' Note, 1. True penitents, when under divine rebukes, call them not only just, but good; not only submit to, but accept of, the punishment of their iniquity. 2. When, at any time, we are under dark dispensations, or have dark prospects, public or personal, we must notice what is for us, as well as what is against us, that we may, by thanksgiving, honor God, and may in our patience possess our own souls. 3. As to public affairs, it is good, and we are bound to think it so, if peace and truth be in our day, if we have peace and truth; the true religion professed and protected, Bibles and ministers, and enjoy these in peace, not terrified with the alarms of war or persecution. Whatever trouble may come when we are gone, it is good if all be well in our days. Not that we should be unconcerned for posterity; but we should own that, to have judgments deferred so long as that we may die in peace, is a particular favor to us. We know not how we shall bear the trial, therefore have reason to think it well, if we may but get safe to heaven before it comes.

Lastly, Here is the conclusion of Hezekiah's life and story, v. 20, 21. In 2 Chr. chs. 29, 30, and 31. much more is recorded of Hezekiah's work of reformation than in this book of Kings: and it seems that in the civil chronicles, not now extant, there were many things recorded of his might, and the good offices he did for Jerusalem, particularly his bringing water by pipes into the city. But here this historian leaves him asleep with his fathers, and a son in his throne that proved very untoward; wicked Ahaz was the son of a godly father, and the father of a godly son; holy Hezekiah the son of a wicked father, and the father of a wicked son. When the land was not reformed, as it should have been, by a good reign, it was plagued and ripened for ruin by a bad one; yet then tried again with a good one, that it might appear, how loath God was to cut off his people.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12—21. Alas! how seldom do we make suitable returns to the Lord for his condescending mercies to us! Ambition and ostentation too generally intrude, where thankfulness alone should occupy the heart; and we are often chargeable with pride, vanity and carnal confidence, when we do not suspect ourselves.—It is very difficult to possess distinctions in rank, wealth, elegant furniture, or any thing valued by men, without a secret self-preference, and a desire that others should admire the possessor's ingenuity, taste, magnificence, or felicity. But it is hopeful, when persons in superior rank will endure to be reasoned with, and reproved by those, who in outward circumstances are greatly their inferiors: for generally such interference, however well meant and prudently conducted, excites resentment.—If we could look into futurity, it would damp our joy in present prosperity: and we may expect vexation from every object, in proportion as we have been inordinately pleased with it.—Our regard to posterity, and our grief for the gloomy prospects before us, in the church or the world, must not render us unmindful of our present mercies, or induce impatient murmurs. Shortly, our trials and services will end together, for our space is limited, though its limits are unknown to us; and then we shall sleep with our fathers. And 'blessed are the dead, which die in the Lord;... for they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them!' SCOTT.

his prudence and affection, and desired to hear the will of God from him. In his answer, he intimated, that he had counted it an honor to receive ambassadors from a far country. (Josh. 9:8—15.) Perhaps, he was not at first conscious of having done wrong; yet, in reviewing and relating his conduct, he was made deeply sensible of his sin and folly. (Note, 2 Chr. 32:30—33, v. 31.) Verses 17, 18.

Considering the small and unsettled power of the king of Babylon, at this time, compared with that of the Assyrian kings, who seemed about to establish a permanent dominion over all the adjacent countries: nothing could be more unlikely, than the accomplishment of this prediction: yet in somewhat more than 100 years it was exactly fulfilled! (Dan. 1:3—7.)—If this transaction occurred before Sennacherib's overthrow, as many suppose, (Note, 12, 13.) it took place previously to Hezekiah's emptying his treasuries, to hire Sennacherib's departure, on his first invasion of the land. (Note, 18:14—16.) The chief reason for assigning this date to it is, that the power of the Assyrians, after the destruction of Sennacherib's army, ceased to be formidable; yet Hezekiah's conduct implied, that he chiefly feared danger from that quarter. But indeed, after that blow, the Assyrian power was far greater than that of any of the neighboring countries; and Hezekiah might desire to form a league, to defend himself and his kingdom against it. CHAP. XXI.

Manasseh reigns very wickedly and idolatrously, 1—9. Prophets are sent to predict judgments upon Judah because of his wickedness, 10—16. He dies and is succeeded by Amon, 17, 18. Amon reigns wickedly, 19—22. He is slain by his servants; the people put the conspirators to death, and make his son Josiah king, 23, 24. Amon's acts and burial, 25, 26.

MANASSEH [a] was twelve years old when he began to reign, and reigned fifty and five years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was [b] Hephzi-bah.

2 And [c] he did that which was evil in the sight of the LORD, [d] after the abominations of the heathen, whom the LORD cast out before the children of Israel.

3 For he built up again [e] the high places which Hezekiah his father had destroyed; and [f] he reared up altars for Baal, and made a grove, as did [g] Ahab king of Israel; [h] and worshipped all the host of heaven, and served them.

4 And [i] he built altars in the house of the LORD, of which the LORD said, [j] In Jerusalem will I put my name.

5 And he built altars for all the host of heaven, [k] in the two courts of the house of the LORD.

6 And [l] he made his son pass through the fire, and [m] observed times, and used enchantments, and dealt with [n] familiar spirits and wizards: he [o] wrought much wickedness in the sight of the LORD, to provoke him to anger.

7 And [p] he set a graven image of the grove, that he had made, in the house, of which the LORD said to David, and to Solomon his son, [q] In this house, and in Jerusalem, which I have chosen out of all the tribes of Israel, will I put my name for ever:

8 Neither [r] will I make the feet of Israel move any more out of the land which I gave their fathers; [s] only if they will observe to do according to all that I have commanded them, and according to all the law that my servant Moses commanded them.

9 But [t] they hearkened not: and Manasseh [u] seduced them to do [x] more evil than did the nations, whom the LORD destroyed before the children of Israel.

CHAP. XXI. In this ch. we have a short account of the reigns of two of the kings of Judah, Manasseh and Amon. By these two reigns Jerusalem was much debauched, and much weakened, and so hastened apace toward its destruction, which slumbered not.

V. 1—9. The reference, Isa. 33: 17. is to Hezekiah, and, as it follows there, v. 20. Jerusalem was a quiet habitation, because a city of righteousness, Isa. 1: 26. But now we have melancholy work on our hands, unpleasant ground to travel, and cannot but drive heavily. These vs. give such an account of this reign, as make it, in all respects, the reverse of the last, and, in a manner, the ruin of it.

I. Manasseh began young, v. 1. born when his father was about 42 years old, three years after his sickness. If he had sons before, either they were dead, or set by as unpromising. Perhaps his coming to the crown so young might help to make him bad, which yet will by no means excuse him, for his grandson Josiah came to it younger than he, and yet acted well. It is too common for novices to be lifted up with pride, and so to fall into the condemnation of the devil. They that were enemies to Hezekiah's reformation, and retained an affection for the old idolatries, flattered him, and thus easily gained his ear, and used his power at pleasure.

II. He reigned longest of any king of Judah, 55 yrs. This was the only very bad reign that was long; Joram's was but 8 years, and Ahaz's 16; as for Manasseh's, we hope that in the beginning of his reign, for some time, affairs continued to move in the course his father left them in; and that in the latter end, after his repentance, religion got head again; and, no doubt, when things were at the worst, God had his remnant that kept their integrity. Some of his time, he was a prisoner in Babylon, though these years are reckoned in the number, because then he repented, and began to reform.

III. He reigned very ill, v. 2, 9. When the holy seed degenerate, they are commonly worse than the worst of the profane. He rebuilt the high places his father had destroyed, v. 3. Thus did he trample on the dust, and affront the memory, of his worthy father. He set up other gods, Baal, and Ashtaroth, (which we translate a grove,) and all the host of heaven, the sun and moon, the other planets, and the constellations; these he worshipped and served, (v. 3.) gave their names to the images he made, and then did homage to them, and prayed for help from them. He made his son pass through the fire, by which he dedicated him a votary to Moloch, in contempt of the seal of circumcision by which he had been dedicated to God. He made the devil his oracle, and, in contempt both of Urim and prophecy, he used enchantments and dealt with familiar spirits, v. 6. like Saul; conjurers and fortune-tellers, who pretended, by the stars of the clouds, lucky and unlucky days, good and bad omens, the flight of birds, or the entrails of beasts, to foretell things to come. We find afterward, v. 16. that he shed innocent blood very much, in gratification of his own passion and revenge; some, perhaps, secretly and some by color of law. Probably, much of the blood he shed was theirs that opposed idolatry, and would not bow the knee to Baal. The blood of the prophets is, in a particular manner, charged on Jerusalem, and probably he put to death many. The Jews' tradition is, he caused Isaiah to be sawn asunder; and many think the apostle refers to that, Heb. 11: 37.

Three things are here mentioned as aggravations of Manasseh's idolatry. (1.) He set up his images and altars in the house of the Lord, v. 4. in the two courts of the temple, v. 5. in the very house of which God had said to Solomon, Here will I put my name, v. 7. Thus he defied God to his face, and impudently affronted Him. Here God's altars had been preserved, while the idolatrous altars were kept at a distance: but Manasseh thus did what he could to alter the property, and to make the name of the God of Israel to be no more in remembrance. (2.) Hereby he greatly slighted the word of God, and his covenant with Israel. Observe the favor shown that people, in putting his name among them—the kindness He intended them never to make them move out of that good land—and the reasonableness of his expectations from them, only if they will observe to do according to all that I have commanded them, v. 7, 8. On these good terms did Israel stand with God, and had as fair a prospect of being happy as any people could have: but they hearkened not, v. 9. (3.) That hereby he seduced the people of God to idola-

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1, 2. It is uncertain whether Hezekiah had any other children than Manasseh, or any other wife than Hephzi-bah, whose name signifies, My delight is in her. (Is. 62: 4.) The event, [Manasseh's reign,] as well as the testimony of the prophets, evinces, that Hezekiah's reformation had been complied with in a reluctant and hypocritical manner, especially by many of the chief men; and that the nation was ripening fast for destruction. (M. R.) SCOTT.

Verse 3.

Pass through the fire.] We wonder that idolatry was not entirely abolished in Israel, even when 'idolatry was the common sense of the age:' but Leland mentions that 'pagan superstitions subsist at this day (about 1760) in Ireland; fires are light[ed] up, at particular times, and the more ignorant Irish still drive their cattle through them, to preserve them from future accidents.' See also Moore's Hist. of I. ED.

Verse 6.

His son.] 'His children.' 2 Chr. 33: 6. Amon was not born till the 33d year of Manasseh's reign, which is generally computed to have been subsequent to his captivity and repentance. (1, 19.) If so, some other son was thus dedicated to his idol, perhaps with some of his daughters likewise, of whom nothing is recorded. But it may be doubted whether Manasseh's captivity was so long before his death: the general character of his reign in Scripture, and the very imperfect reformation which afterwards took place, seem to render that opinion improbable; and there is no scriptural information concerning the date of his captivity, or even the name of the Assyrian king who carried him captive: so that perhaps Amon was the son here peculiarly intended. ['Amon-the-sun' was the chief deity of the Egyptians; note 1 K. 12: 28.] (2 Chr. 33: 11.) SCOTT.

Of the grove. (7) Perhaps this was a model of some grove, [Egyptian monuments often represent a tree among the offerings made by devotees to the idols,] used for idolatrous worship: though it is commonly supposed to have been the image of one of Manasseh's idols. (17: 16.) Some think it was a wooden image of Ashtaroth, or Astarte. (Judg. 2: 11—13, &c.)—Manasseh seems to have placed this image in the temple itself. ID.

Verses 10—12.

(M. R.) It is not certain, that any of the prophets, whose writings have come down to us, lived in the time of Manasseh. Isaiah and Hoses probably were dead. (16. 19: 2. Is. 1: 1. Hos. 1: 1.) Jeremiah spake by his servants the prophets, saying,

11 [z] Because Manasseh king of Judah hath done these abominations, and hath done wickedly [a] above all that the Amorites did, which were before him, and hath [b] made Judah also to sin with his idols;

12 Therefore thus saith the LORD God of Israel, Behold, [c] I am bringing such evil upon Jerusalem and Judah, that [d] whosoever heareth of it, both his ears shall tingle.

13 And [e] I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria, and [f] the plummet of the house of Ahab: and [g] I will wipe Jerusalem, as a man wipeth a dish, [*] wiping it, and turning it upside down.

14 And [h] I will forsake [i] the remnant of mine inheritance, and [j] deliver them into the hand of their enemies, and they shall become a prey and a spoil to all their enemies;

15 Because they have done that which was evil in my sight, and have provoked me to anger, [k] since the day their fathers came forth out of Egypt, even unto this day.

16 Moreover, [l] Manasseh shed innocent blood very much, till he had filled Jerusalem from [†] one end to another, [m] beside his sin wherewith he made Judah to sin, in doing that which was evil in the sight of the LORD.

17 Now [n] the rest of the acts of Manasseh, and all that he did, and his sin that he sinned, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?

B. C. 643. 18 And Manasseh slept with his fathers, [o] and was buried in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza: and Amon his son reigned in his stead.

19 ¶ [p] Amon was twenty and two years old when he began to reign; and he reigned [q] two years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Meshullemeth, the daughter of Haruz of Jotbah.

20 And he did that which was evil in the sight of the LORD, [r] as his father Manasseh did.

21 And he walked in all the way that his father walked in, and served the idols that his father served, and worshipped them:

22 And [s] he forsook the LORD God of his fathers, and walked not in the way of the LORD.

V. 10—18. Here is the doom of Judah and Jerusalem—a heavy doom. The prophets were sent, in the first place, to teach them the knowledge of God, remind them of their duty, and direct them in it: if they succeeded not, their next work was to reprove them for their sins, and set them before them, that they might repent and return to their duty: if in this they prevailed not, their next work was, to foretell the judgments of God, that the terror of them might awaken those to repentance, who would not be made sensible of the obligations of his love, or else that the execution of them, in their season, might demonstrate the divine mission of the prophets that foretold them. The prophets were deputed judges to those that would not hear and receive them as teachers. Here is,

I. A recital of the indictment, v. 11. Manasseh has done wickedly himself, though he knew better things, has even justified the Amorites, outdoing them in impieties, has debauched the people of God, taught, and forced them to sin; and beside that, has multiplied his murders in every corner of the city, v. 16. and filled the measure of Jerusalem's blood-guiltiness (Matt. 23: 32.) up to the brim, all against the crown and dignity of the King of kings, the peace of his kingdom, and the statutes in these cases made and provided.

II. A prediction of the judgment; it should be, 1. Very terrible and amazing, the very report of it should make men's hearts tremble, v. 12. 2. It should be copied (as the sins of Jerusalem had been) from Samaria, and the house of Ahab, v. 13. marking out the same ruin to which that wretched family was devoted. See Isa. 28: 17. Note, Those who imitate others' sins, must expect their fate. 3. It should be an utter destruction: I will wipe it as a man wipes a dish. This intimates, (1.) That every thing should be put into disorder, and their state subverted. (2.) That the city should be emptied of its inhabitants, which had been the filth of it; they shall all be carried captive, the land shall enjoy her sabbaths, and be laid by as a dish when it is wiped. See the comparison of the boiled pot, not much unlike this, Ezek. 24: 1—14. (3.) That yet this should be in order to the purifying, not the destroying of Jerusalem. The dish shall not be dropped, not broken to pieces, or melted down, but only wiped. 4. That therefore they should be destroyed, because they should be deserted, v. 14. Justly are those that forsake God, forsaken of Him; nor does He ever leave any, till they have first left Him: they then become an easy prey to all enemies. Sin is spoken of here as the alpha and omega of their miseries.

This is all we have here of Manasseh; he stands convicted and condemned. True penitents take shame to themselves, not honor.

V. 19—26. Here is a brief account of the short and inglorious reign of Amon, son of Manasseh. Whether Manasseh, in his blind and brutish zeal for his idols, had sacrificed his other sons; or whether, having been dedicated to his idols, they were refused by the people, his successor was not born till he was 45 years old. And,

1. His reign was very wicked, v. 20—22. He trod in the steps of his father's idolatry, and revived that which he, in the latter end of his days, had put down. Note, those who set bad examples, though they may repent themselves, yet cannot be sure that those whom they have drawn into sin by their example, will repent; it is often otherwise.

2. His end was very tragical. He having rebelled against God, his own servants conspired against him, and slew him; probably, on some personal disgust, when he had reigned but 2 years, v. 23. He had profaned God's house with his idols, and now God suffered his own house to be polluted with did not begin to prophesy till several years after Manasseh's death. It is not known when Joel flourished. Nahum and Habakkuk seem to have lived at a later period. Verse 16.

Probably, infants were burnt in the fire, by Manasseh's authority and command, to Moloch; and the oppression, violence, and cruelty of his general administration might occasion much unrighteous shedding of blood: but his persecuting rage, against those who opposed and reproved his idolatries, seems especially intended.—It is not said that Isaiah prophesied in the days of Manasseh; nor is it probable he did. Verses 17, 18.

His preparing a sepulchre for himself, not with the kings, seems to have been a penitent confession, that his crimes had rendered him unworthy to be numbered with the descendants of David. Some, however, suppose that the people would not allow him that honor. Yet, no doubt, he was a true penitent, though it is not here mentioned. (1 K. 11: 42, 43. 2 Chr. 33: 11—19.) ID.

CHAP. XXII. This ch. begins the story of the reign of good king Josiah, whose goodness shines the brighter, because it came just after so much wickedness, he had the honor to reform; and just before so great a destruction, he yet had not the honor to prevent.

V. 1—10. Concerning Josiah, observe,

I. He was very young, when he began to reign, v. 1. Solomon says, Wo unto thee, O land, when thy king is a child; but happy art thou, O land, when thy king is such a child. Our English Israel had once a king (Edward VI.) that was such a child. Josiah, being young, had not received any bad impressions from the example of his father and grandfather, but soon saw their errors, and God gave him grace to take warning by them. See Ezek. 18: 14, &c.

II. He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, v. 2. See the sovereignty of divine grace: the father passed by and left to perish in his sin; the son a chosen vessel. Many about him, no doubt, advised him to tread in his father's steps, and few gave him any good counsel; yet the grace of God makes him an eminent saint, Rom. 11: 24. Nothing is too hard for that grace to do.

III. He took care for the repair of the temple. This he did in the 18th year of his reign, v. 3. comp. 2 Chr. 34: 8. He began much sooner to seek the Lord, as appears, 2 Chr. 34: 3. but it is to be feared, the work of reformation went slowly on, and met with much opposition, so that he could not effect what he desired and designed, till his power was thoroughly confirmed. The consideration of the time we unavoidably lost in our minority, should quicken us, when we come to years, to act with so much the more vigor in the service of God. Having begun late, we had need work hard. It seems, v. 4. they took much the same way of raising the money that Joash took, ch. 12: 9. When people gave a little at a time, the burden was insensible, and the contribution, being voluntary, was not complained of. The workmen too, as in the days of Joash, acquitted themselves so well, that there was no reckoning made with them, v. 7. which is certainly mentioned to the praise of the workmen, but whether to the praise of those that employed them I know not; a man should count money, (we say,) after his own father; it had not been amiss to have reckoned with the workmen, that others also might be satisfied of their honesty.

IV. In the repairing of the temple, the book of the law was happily found and brought to the king, v. 8, 10. the autograph, or original manuscript, of the five books of Moses, under his own hand, so some; others think is was only an ancient and authentic copy; most likely it was that which, by the command of Moses, was laid up in the most holy place, Deut. 31: 24, &c.

1. It seems, this book of the law was lost and missing; either carelessly mislaid and neglected;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—26. Young persons are generally desirous of being their own masters, and of obtaining early possession of riches or power, that they may indulge their inclinations and self importance: and too often, from such motives, are secretly rejoiced at the death of their parents. But it is much safer and happier, when youth is sheltered under the fostering care of affectionate and prudent parents, or of faithful guardians and tutors; till greater maturity of age and experience gives a more hopeful prospect of discretion. Such young persons may live to be thankful for the restraints, under which at present they are impatient.—None are more abandoned than those, who become wicked after a religious education; for they cannot have quietness in vice, till by desperate courses they have effectually stupefied their consciences; and in every case, the greater the obstacles which are surmounted, before men attain to the undisturbed indulgence of their lusts, the more lost they are afterwards to all sense of shame or decency.—The mind of man is disposed to vibrate from one extreme to another; so that times of remarkable revival in religion have often been succeeded by those of most notorious infidelity, impiety, and profligacy. [Especially when some feelings and propensities, rather than the reason and conscience have been most appealed to, and thus placed under undue excitement: over-action requiring over-rest.]—The ambition of excelling, prompts sinners to aspire after pre-eminence even in crimes; and men are capable of glorying in having gone beyond all their predecessors in iniquity, and in refining on the blasphemy and sensuality of former times, or of contemporary rivals in vice!—An infidel neglect of true religion, is often connected with the most absurd credulity and ridiculous superstitions!—Some daring sinners not only seek to gratify their lusts, but seem desirous of forcing their crimes on the notice of the Almighty; as if ambitious of provoking his indignation by every token of contempt and defiance! and they peculiarly delight in seducing others to commit the same wickedness, as if ambitious also of promoting the ruin of their souls!—The vain-glory of young persons often appears in affecting to be wiser than their prudent and pious parents, by reversing all their plans, and especially by treating with contempt their religious singularities, as they suppose them to be. It is well, when the removal of the ungodly makes way for better characters: yet those who, instigated by any corrupt passion, execute deserved vengeance on wicked men, will bring deserved vengeance on themselves also. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1, 2. Josiah was seated on the throne by those, who brought his father's murderers to justice, and who doubtless were friends to the family of David: for 'the people of the land,' must be understood to mean, at least, a majority of the elders and great men assembling, and, with the approbation of the people, declaring to whom the right of succeeding to the throne belonged. It may be supposed, that some of the nobles were concerned in the conspiracy against Amon, or favored the cause. (21: 20—24.) We may therefore conclude that the persons, intrusted with Josiah's education, were at least averse to idolatry, and favorable to the worship of JEHOVAH. Perhaps his mother was a pious person, and instilled good principles into his tender mind.—We can obtain but a superficial knowledge of the state of Judah from these compendious historical records, unless we compare them with the writings of the contemporary prophets. SCOTT.

Verses 3—7.

Josiah began to seek the Lord in the 8th year of his reign, and to attempt a public reformation in the 12th; so that considerable progress had before been made in destroying the idols, which filled Judah and Jerusalem to an almost inconceivable degree: but in his 18th year he proceeded to reinstate the temple and its worship in their former splendor, and the principal reformation in his reign was effected at this time. or, maliciously concealed by some of the idolatrous kings; restrained by the providence of God, or their own consciences, from destroying it; or, (as some think,) carefully laid up by some of its friends, lest it should fall into the hands of its enemies: whoever were the instruments of its preservation, we ought to acknowledge the hand of God in it; if this was the only authentic copy of the Pentateuch then in being, sure we now have reason to thank God, on our knees, for that happy providence by which Hilkiah found it at this time, when he sought it not. If the holy Scriptures had not been of God, they had not been in being at this day; God's care of the Bible, is a plain indication of his interest in it.

2. Whether this was the only authentic copy in being or no, it seems, the things contained in it were new, both to the king himself and to the high priest, for the king, on the reading of it, rent his clothes; probably the command for the king's writing a copy of the law, and that for the public reading of the law every 7th year, Deut. 17: 18. —31: 10, 11. had neither of them been observed of a long time. When the instituted means of keeping up religion are neglected, religion itself will soon go to decay; yet on the other hand, if the book of the law was lost, it seems difficult to determine what rule Josiah went by, in doing that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and how the priest and people kept up the rites of their religion: I am apt to think the people generally took up with abstracts of the law, the priests had furnished them with; a sort of ritual, directing them in the observances of their religion, but leaving out what they thought fit, and particularly the promises and threatenings, Lev. 26. and Deut. 28, &c. for I observe, those were the portions of the law Josiah was so much affected with, v. 13. as being new to him; no summaries, extracts, or collections, out of the Bible, can effectually convey and preserve the knowledge of God and his will, like the Bible itself; no marvel the people were so corrupt, when the book of the law was such a scarce thing among them; where that vision is not, the people perish; they that endeavored to debauch them, no doubt, used all the arts they could to get that book out of their hands; the Church of Rome could not keep up the use of images, but by forbidding the use of the Scriptures.

3. It was a great instance of God's favor, and a token for good to Josiah and his people, that the book of the law was thus seasonably brought to light, to direct and quicken their reformation; it is a sign God has mercy in store for a people, when He magnifies his law among them, makes it honorable, and furnishes them with means for the increase of scripture knowledge: the translating of the Scriptures into vulgar tongues, was the glory, strength and joy of the Reformation from Popery.

V. 11—20. Here we have,

I. The impressions the reading of the law made on Josiah; he had long thought the case of his kingdom bad, by reason of the idolatries and impieties found among the people, but never so bad as he perceived it to be, by this book of the law; the rending of his clothes signified the rending of his heart for the dishonor done to God, and the ruin he saw coming on his people.

II. The application he made to God, hereupon, v. 13. Convictions of sin and wrath should put us on the inquiry, What shall we do to be saved? Wherewithal shall we come before the Lord? If ye will thus inquire, inquire quickly, before it be too late. He acknowledges, if this be the rule of right, certainly our fathers have been much in the wrong. Now that the commandment came, sin revived, and appeared sin. He infers hence certainly; if this be the Word of God, as, no doubt it is, and He will be true to his Word, as, no doubt, He will be, wrath is kindled against us, we are all undone. Note, Those who are truly apprehensive of the weight of God's wrath, cannot but be very solicitous to obtain his favor, and inquisitive how they may make their peace with Him; magistrates should inquire for their people, and study how to prevent the judgments of God they see hanging over them.

This inquiry Josiah sent by some of his great men, v. 12, 14. (honoring the oracle, by employing those of the first rank,) to Huldah the prophetess, v. 14. The spirit of prophecy was sometimes put not only into earthen vessels, but into the weaker vessels, that the excellency of the power might be of God. Miriam had helped to lead Israel out of Egypt, (Mic. 6: 4.) Deborah judged them, and now Huldah instructed them in the mind of God; her being a wife, was no prejudice to her being a prophetess, marriage is honorable to all. It was a mercy to Jerusalem, that when Bibles were scarce, they had prophets, as that, afterward, when prophecy ceased, they had more Bibles; God never leaves Himself without witness, because He will leave sinners without excuse. Jeremiah and Zephaniah prophesied at this time, yet the king's messengers made Huldah their oracle, probably because, her husband having a place at court, v. 14. they had had more and longer acquaintance with her, and greater assurances of her commission than of any other; [perhaps being young, and newly entered on their work, Jeremiah and Zephaniah were of inferior note, or elsewhere employed. Scott.] They had, it is likely, consulted Huldah on other occasions, and found the word of God in her mouth to be truth; she was near, for she dwelt at Jerusalem, in a place called Mishneh, the second rank of buildings from the royal palace; the Jews say she that prophesied among the women, the court ladies, being herself one of them, who, it is probable, had their apartments in that place;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 1—11. Those who have been favored, in their tender years, with prudent and pious instructers, have very great cause for gratitude: it commonly proves the means of determining both the comfort and usefulness, and the happy close, of their future lives.—It is a peculiar favor to be brought to seek and serve God in early life, and to be led to copy closely the best examples.—In the worst of times, we meet with examples of liberality, fidelity, and integrity, worthy of praise and imitation.—The prevalence of impiety, infidelity, superstition, or licentiousness, renders the Word of God a neglected book; and that neglect reciprocally augments these evils. And when professed ministers grow careless, selfish, [fond of power,] or superstitious, the people of course become generally ignorant of the sacred oracles: and far more, when they employ their influence, and exert their authority, to keep the Scriptures, as translated into the language of their several countries, out of the hands of the common people; and to discountenance the study of them; and when they endeavor to obstruct those who would circulate, and encourage the study of, the oracles of God. Alas! that this stigma of popery should disgrace so many rulers and teachers of our protestant church!—'The Word of God is quick and powerful;' and, being 'sharper than any two-edged sword,' it penetrates the heart and conscience with irresistible energy. (Jer. 23:28,29. Heb. 4:12,13.) By the holy law is the knowledge of sin, and by the blessed gospel is the knowledge of salvation. When the former is understood, in its strictness, extent, excellency, and awful sanction, the sinner perceives his guilt, is convinced that the great wrath of the Lord is kindled against him for his transgressions: and begins to inquire, 'What must I do to be saved?'—The scarcity of the written Word did not excuse Israel's degeneracy and idolatry, because it was the effect of it; 'the people loved to have it so;' but the abundance of Bibles, with which this land is favored, will exceedingly aggravate the guilt of our national impiety, infidelity, and licentiousness: for what greater contempt of God can we show, than to refuse to read his Word, when put into our hands; or, reading it, to refuse to believe and obey it?

Verses 8—11.

The inquiries and controversies, this account of finding the book of the law has occasioned, seem quite unnecessary. If it were conceded, that no other complete copy existed in all the world, at the time this book was found, it would not in the smallest degree invalidate the authenticity of that part of holy writ: because all the succeeding writers of the Scriptures, with Christ Himself and his apostles, have given the sanction of their testimony to its divine original. All the cavils and objections therefore of infidels, grounded on this circumstance, mean nothing; except to demonstrate their imbittered enmity to the Scriptures.—It is highly probable, that copies of the law were at that time very scarce, through the idolatry of the former reigns, and the lamentable ungodliness of the people. It may also be reasonably conjectured, that the priests had made abstracts from it, of the outlines of their worship, without specifying particulars, or inserting the solemn sanctions annexed to each. This would spare them the trouble of transcribing, or studying, or reading to the people, the whole book; and, as these abstracts would come into common use, few people would look any further. But had not a universal traditional recollection of the law, and in general of its contents, prevailed in the nation; how could the book, when found, have obtained proper and implicit credit as the Word of God by Moses? In the dark ages of popery this was precisely the case: the liturgies and rituals contained a few selected portions of Scripture; and not only were the people kept in the dark as to the entire contents of the Bible, but few even of the priests had ever read it through, and numbers of these had never seen a complete copy of it. The same naturally becomes the case still, (notwithstanding the multiplication of copies of the Bible by the art of printing, and its public allowance in the vulgar tongue, and the commendable pains bestowed by pious persons to disperse them,) whenever any set of men become strenuous for one part of religion in preference to the rest. The oracles of each party, insert in their writings those portions of Scripture, which are supposed to inculcate the doctrines for which they contend; but keep out of sight, perhaps without design, those passages which as strongly declare what they undervalue, overlook, or are prejudiced against. And these writings form the religion of the zealous friends of that party, while the rest of the Scripture is comparatively neglected or forgotten. Indeed we all are disposed to have favorite passages of Scripture, to which we are more attentive than to the rest; so that without great care we shall be led into this error.—And may it not be hinted with propriety, that some text-books, which were well designed, are yet capable of a dangerous abuse? I mean those books, which give a text of Scripture for every day, with pious observations upon it. Many read these in family-worship, instead of the Bible itself; and others, it is likely, do the same in their closets: but numbers are thus undesignedly led to substitute a part for the whole; the abstract with an exposition, instead of the book of the law: whereas 'all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.' (2 Tim. 3: 14—17.) The proper use of such books is, to suggest subjects for pious meditations and ejaculations, in the intervals of conversation and business.—The book, which Hilkiah found, seems to have been the original book of the law, deposited by Moses at the side of the ark; (Deut. 31: 26.) but which in those distracted times had been removed, either for concealment, lest it should be destroyed by the idolaters, or in contempt by those who were turning every thing into confusion. Some argue that this circumstance occasioned Josiah's consternation: but he certainly acted like a man who had never seen the law before, and this most likely was the case, though there might be copies dispersed among his subjects. It is probable his reformation had hitherto been conducted by such abstracts, as have been mentioned, or by traditional knowledge. If the kings of Judah had observed the rule of transcribing the law with their own hands, very salutary effects might have been produced; but it seems to have been entirely neglected, as well as the command to read the law publicly to the people, every year at the feast of tabernacles. (Deut. 17: 18. 31: 9—13. Neh. 8: 1—18. 9: 3.)—It is supposed that the portion, which was first read to Josiah, was the 28th and 29th chs. of Deut. and these were doubtless well suited to convince him, that the guilt and danger of his people were much greater than he had apprehended, and to induce his expressions of fear, sorrow, and humiliation. We may conclude, that he afterwards conducted his reformation with more exactness; as he now wrought by rule, and was aware of the imminent danger to which he and his subjects were exposed. SCOTT.

(8.) 'The interval between the death of Moses, and that of Josiah, was 950 yrs. and we have MSS. of greater age than this.' Kennicott. Nay, we have writings of an age anterior to that of Moses even; Champollion says, of 1732 yrs. B. C. ED.

Verses 12, 13.

Very little is recorded concerning the high priests, as active instruments in reformation, and reviving true religion. Hilkiah indeed seems to have been a man of good character; though it is likely, not well acquainted with the divine law. (M. R.) Josiah, however, never proposed inquiring of the Lord, by him and the breast-plate of judgment; nor did Hilkiah object, when sent with others to inquire of a prophetess. Either he was ignorant, that to inquire of God was one distinguishing part of his office; or he humbly thought himself unworthy to perform it: or this method of inquiry was considered as obsolete; having fallen into disuse, perhaps, from the too general want of true piety in the high priests, who had been superseded in this respect by the prophets raised up in constant succession. R.* c.—1 Cor. 14: 34, 35. 1 Tim. 2:11—14.)—Whether the word rendered 'the college' means an institution at Jerusalem, in some respects similar to the schools of the prophets in Israel; or whether it only denotes, according to the marg. the part of the city in which she lived, is not agreed. The latter opinion, however, seems most probable, as the same original word is in the next ch. translated 'of the second order.' (Note, 23:4.) SCOTT. Boothr. understands 'suburbs.' ED.

CHAP. XXIII.

Josiah reads the law in a solemn assembly gathered for that and similar purposes, 1, 2. He enters into covenant with God; and abolishes idolatry in Judah, 3—14. He burns men's bones on the altar at Bethel; fulfils the prediction of the prophet sent to Jeroboam; destroys the high places in Samaria, and slays the priests, 15—20. He celebrates a solemn passover, 21—23. He puts away wizards, &c. 24; and excels all his predecessors, 25. The wrath of God against Judah is yet unappeased, 26—28. Josiah is slain in battle by Pharaoh-necho, and succeeded by Jehoahaz, 29, 30; who reigns wickedly three months, is led away prisoner by Pharaoh into Egypt, and succeeded by Jehoiakim, 31—34; who taxes the land for Pharaoh's tribute, and reigns wickedly, 35—37.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1—3. Josiah had received a message from God, that there was no preventing the ruin of Jerusalem, but that he only should deliver his own soul; yet he does not therefore sit down in despair, and resolve to do nothing for his country, because he cannot do all he would; no, he will do his duty, and then leave the event to God; a public reformation is the thing resolved on; if any thing prevent the threatened ruin, it must be that, and here we have the preparations for it.

1. He summoned a general assembly of the states, the elders, the magistrates, or representatives, of Judah and Jerusalem, to meet him in the house of the Lord, with the priests and prophets, the ordinary and extraordinary ministers, that, they all joining in it, it might become a national act, and so be the more likely to prevent national judgments, v. 1, 2. that the business might be done with the more solemnity, that they might all advise and assist in it, and that those who were against it, might be discouraged from making any opposition; parliaments are no diminution to the honor and power of good princes, but a great support.

2. Instead of making a speech to this convention, he ordered the book of the law to be read; nay, it should seem he read it himself, v. 2. as one much affected with it, and desirous they should be so too. Beside the convention of the great men, he had a congregation of the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. If the people be but as steadfastly resolved to obey by law, as he is to govern by law, the kingdom will be happy; al. people are concerned to know the Scripture, and all in authority to spread the knowledge of it.

3. Instead of proposing laws to confirm them in their duty, he proposed an association, by which they should all jointly engage themselves to God, v. 3. The book of the law was the book of the covenant, that if they would be to God a people, He would be to them a God; they here engage themselves to do their part, not doubting God would do his. The covenant was, that they should walk after the Lord, in compliance with his will, in his ordinances and providences, answer all his calls, attend all his motions, make conscience of all his commandments, moral, ceremonial, and judicial, and so fulfil the conditions of this covenant, in dependence on the promises of it. The covenanters were, first, the king himself, who stood by his pillar, ch. 11: 14. and publicly declared his consent to this covenant; it is no abridgment of the liberty even of princes themselves to be in bonds to God; then all the people likewise: it is of good use, with all possible solemnity, to oblige ourselves to our duty, and it is especially seasonable after notorious backslidings to sin, and decays in that which is good; he that bears an honest mind, does not shrink from positive engagements.

V. 4—24. We have here an account of such

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12—20. The ministers of religion must communicate to the people whatever they have learned respecting the will of God, whether alarming or encouraging: otherwise they do not 'declare his whole counsel,' nor 'keep themselves pure from the blood of all men:' and they are guilty of the basest and most cruel unfaithfulness, if, from regard to their own safety or emolument, they keep back offensive truths.—It is also becoming, when superior stated pastors and rulers of the church discard prejudice and jealousy, respecting those among their inferiors, or of other orders in society, whom God endows with peculiar spiritual gifts for the edifying of his people; when, instead of standing on character and precedency, and hindering others from regarding their advice, they take the lead in honoring the grace of God in them, and gladly receive their profitable instructions. Such are wise men, and will daily grow wiser; because they are conscious that they have not attained, but need continual accessions to their measure of divine knowledge and grace: but those who are too great or too proud to learn, even from their inferiors, are likely to live and to die without true wisdom.—A tender, broken, and contrite heart, a humble consciousness of having deserved wrath, and an earnest application for mercy, are things which 'accompany salvation,' and will never be rejected by our gracious Lord and Savior

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1, 2. The prophets. (2) Probably the king neither employed them, nor the priests, in reading the law to the elders of the people, at least not exclusively; but that he performed the service personally as the principal reader, though others might be employed in the same manner, in different stations; 'for it is not likely that one man's voice could reach so great a multitude.' Patrick. Acts 2:14—21.) The opinion, that he only engaged others to read the law, seems taken from modern refinements, and sentiments of royal dignity; and not from facts, good sense, or the examples of pious princes in those days. (2 Sam. 6:12—22. 1 K. 8.10—61. Ec. 1:1.) For such is human nature, that so trivial a circumstance, as the rank of the reader or speaker, will frequently excite greater attention, than matters of acknowledged superior importance.

SCOTT.

(M. R.) We learn from the event, that the most of those present, who 'stood to the covenant,' were hypocritical in the transaction; being induced to concur, in order to please the king, or to avoid his displeasure and the reproach of singularity; or by some transient impression upon their minds. Yet Josiah did well in requiring them thus to engage, as far as they could be prevailed on without compulsion. A great deal of outward wickedness would be prevented; many individuals would receive essential benefit; and in every way the name, worship, and law of God were honored: while those who acted hypocritically, and violated their engagements by apostasy, were accountable to God for their conduct. (11:17—20. Deut. 29.10—15. Neh. 10:1.) Indeed, no effectual means can be used of doing extensive good, which will not eventually prove an occasion of deeper guilt and condemnation to many. 'The priests of the second order' seem to have been the heads of the several courses, which served in rotation, under the person next in succession to the high priesthood, who acted on emergencies as deputy to the high priest. These were the chief priests mentioned so often in the N. T. (1 Chr. 24.1—19. Ezra 2:36—39.)—Josiah, in his former well-meant attempts for reformation, had probably removed the idols, and abolished the worship of them in Jerusalem: but, perhaps, he had supposed, that the vessels and other valuables might be reserv-

5. There was Tophet, in the valley of the son of Hinnom, very near Jerusalem, where was the image of Molech, to which some sacrificed their children, burning them in the fire, others dedicated them, making them to pass through the fire, v. 10. laboring in the very fire, Heb. 2: 13. It is supposed to have been called Tophet, from toph, a drum, because they beat drums at the burning of the children, that their shrieks might not be heard.

6. There were high places before Jerusalem, which Solomon had built, v. 13. The altars and images on those high places, we may suppose, had been taken away by some of the preceding godly kings, or, perhaps, Solomon himself when he became a penitent; but the buildings, or some parts of them, remained, with other high places, till Josiah's time. They that introduce corruptions into religion, know not how long they will last; antiquity is no certain proof of verity: there were also high places all the kingdom over, from Geba to Beer-sheba, v. 8. and high places of the gates, in the entering in of the gate of the governor; in those high places (Patrick thinks) they burnt incense to those tutelar gods, to whom their idolatrous kings had committed the protection of their city; and, probably, the governor of the city had a private altar for his Penates—his household-gods.

They that sacrificed to Osiris, or that wept for Tammuz, Ezek. 8: 14. or that worshipped the infernal deities, put on black garments as mourners. Those idolatrous priests, the kings of Judah had ordained to burn incense in the high places; they were, it should seem, priests of the house of Aaron, who thus profaned their dignity, there were others also who had no right at all to the priesthood, who burnt incense to Baal.

8. There were conjurers and wizards, and such as dealt with familiar spirits, v. 24. When they worshipped the devil as their god, no marvel they consulted him as their oracle.

II. What a full destruction good Josiah made of all those relics of idolatry; such is his zeal for the Lord of Hosts, and his holy indignation against all that is displeasing to Him; the law was, that the monuments of the Canaanites' idolatry must be all destroyed, Deut. 7: 5. much more of the idolatry of the Israelites, in whom it was still more impious, profane, and perfidious.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. Nothing ought to discourage our endeavors to promote a revival of true religion.—As sinners cannot be preserved from eternal destruction, without repentance; so, degenerate nations cannot be rescued from public calamities, without general reformation.—All external obligations to the service of God may be entered into with a hypocritical, or self-righteous spirit: yet this should not make us object to such engagements ourselves, or averse to propose them; but only make us cautious in what manner we do it, and careful to inculcate the same caution on others. —In those nations, which profess to worship God, and which are favored with the light of revelation, we need only to investigate with diligence, and compare the result of our observations with the Word of truth, to discover such enormous and multiplied abominations, as could never have been conceived on a distant and superficial view, or a judgment formed by other rules. Even in worshipping congregations, an exact scrutiny would commonly bring to light such evils, as before were never suspected: but the most humiliating discoveries will be made, by an exact inquiry into our own hearts and conduct. That man, who previously deemed his behavior unexceptionable and his heart good, if he can be engaged in diligent self-examination and watchfulness, daily beholding himself in the mirror of God's Word, and for a long time comparing with it his thoughts, intentions, dispositions, words, and actions; will experience increasing convictions of the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of his heart, and of the exceeding sinfulness of his whole life. And if he set about amendment, in dependence on the mercy and grace of God in Jesus Christ, and according to the rule of the Bible, he will, as he proceeds, find still more and more to be done; and to the end of his life perceive, that he is very far off from the perfect righteousness of the holy law.—The scriptural history may well excite the hatred and disgust of the proud admirers of the human heart and understanding; as it presents to our view a very mortifying picture of the blindness of man's mind, as well as of the perverseness of his will, and the depravity of his affections. But, suppose the appeal made to other histories, or to universal observation and experience:—if the records of Greece and Rome were presented to our view, as a detail of facts, without the varnish of declamation and panegyric, and impartially compared with the just and holy law of God; would not their idolatries and immoralities be found to exceed even those of Israel? (Rom. 1:28—32.) Would they not picture human nature as blinded and depraved as the Bible does? And do not all the encomiums bestowed on them, arise from man's disposition to 'call good evil, and evil good, to put darkness for light, and light for darkness?' (Note, Is. 5:20.) Pride, ambition, rapacity, cruelty, and revenge, have even been canonized by poets, and orators, and historians: and idolatry, impiety, brutal excess, and unnatural lusts have been called by soft names, and excused, if not vindicated, by these elegant and ingenious ancients. Otherwise the conclusion is as irrefragable from the study of profane history, as from the records of God's Word, that 'the imagination of man's heart is only evil from his youth:' and that all the real godliness, or goodness, which has ever been found on earth, has been derived from the new creating Spirit of Jesus Christ.—In reducing our conduct, or that of others, to the standard of Scripture, in evident and important matters, no allowance must be made for customary, reputable, ancient, or fashionable abuses: no man must be known after the flesh; nor any attention paid to persuasions, complaints, remonstrances, or reproaches; nor even to prejudices, except in matters of subordinate consequence. Therefore courage, constancy, and patience, are requisite for such attempts; and these, when genuine, can spring only from grace and faith, and be given in answer to prayer, without which every undertaking of this kind will be fruitless.—Not only should gross abominations be precluded; but every temptation, or occasion of sin, should be removed, whatever be the secular loss or expense, if we would effectually glorify God, and do good: and every method should be adopted to fill men's minds with abhorrence of iniquity, and to show plausible abuses in a contemptible and detestable light: especially where godly people are liable to be seduced into pernicious compliances. Verses 15—20.

Josiah had evidently some authority over a great part of the country, which the ten tribes had occupied; (2 Chr. 34:6.) but it is not certain, whether this was by grant from the king of Assyria, or by the willing subjection of the inhabitants: the former, however, appears the more probable. (29, 30.) On this occasion he exactly accomplished the prediction of the man of God concerning him, delivered about 360 years before: and though he may be supposed to have designed that accomplishment; yet so wicked a man as his father could have had no such intentions, in giving his son the name of Josiah.—It has been justly observed, that if Josiah had entertained the same notions of the sanctity of relics, which have so long prevailed among professed Christians; he would have bestowed at least as much pains in honoring the bones of the old prophet from Judah, as he did in disgracing

(M. R.) The whole narrative marks the care with which this pious prince had studied 'the book of the law,' after it was found; the diligent investigation which he made, to detect and destroy every thing forbidden in it; and the exactness, as well as earnestness, with which his reformation was conducted. Had the princes and people been as sincere and zealous as their king, the happiest effects would have followed. (Jer. 3:6—11. Zeph. 1:5—8.) ID.

Verses 26, 27.

Josiah lived above 13 years after this great reformation, and to the end retained the people in the external worship of God: (2 Chr. 34:33.) but in general they relapsed secretly into many of their former idolatries and iniquities; and, as a collective body, they were not greatly amended in the sight of a heart-searching God.—They had heartily concurred in the idolatries and crimes of Manasseh, but they had not imitated his repentance: on the other hand, they had hypocritically joined in Josiah's reformation, and were ripe, on his removal, to join the apostasy of his sons. (25.) Manasseh's wickedness, therefore, was accounted national, and filled up their measure of iniquity; whereas Josiah's piety was personal, and the hypocrisy and apostasy of the people aggravated their guilt and hastened their ruin. (21:13—16. 22:15—20. 24:3, 4.) But though the Lord did not turn from the fierceness of his great wrath, so as to spare Jerusalem from desolation, and the Jews from captivity: yet this event proved a kind of crisis in their disease: and while the wicked perished in vast numbers, the remnant was purified; and Josiah's reformation probably had a very happy effect, in raising up many persons to join this small remnant, which proved the precious seed of their future church and nation. Verses 29, 30.

Nabopollazar, king of Babylon, assisted by the Medes, is supposed, before this time, to have conquered the Assyrians and destroyed Nineveh. [Note * p. 350.] Thus he became king of Assyria also: and some learned men are of opinion, that after Manasseh was freed from captivity, the kings of Judah reigned over the country formerly possessed by the ten tribes, as tributaries and allies to the kings of Babylon.—Josiah might therefore consider himself as under engagements to the king of Assyria, as well as unwilling that the contending parties should march their armies through his country: he however lost his life in the attempt. Megiddo was situated in the lot of Manasseh, in the northern part of the land: (Judg. 1:27.) but at this time it seems to have been under Josiah's government. Perhaps Josiah disguised himself, that the king of Egypt might not know him; but he, having discovered him, singled him out for slaughter.—As Zedekiah was no more than 21 years old, when he was made king, after Jehoiakim had reigned 11 years, and Jeconiah his son a short time; (24:18.) he of course was younger than Jehoahaz, though mentioned before him in Chr. to show that thus he would have done by the priests themselves, had they been alive, as he did by those whom he found alive, v. 20. thus he polluted the altar, desecrated it, and made it odious. This, as it was Josiah's act, seems to be the result of a very sudden resolve; he had not done it, but that he happened to turn himself, and spy the sepulchres, yet it was foretold above 350 years before, when this altar was first built by Jeroboam, 1 K. 13: 2. God always foresees, and has sometimes foretold as certain, what yet to us seems most contingent; the king's heart is in the hand of the Lord; king Josiah's was so, and He turned it, (or ever he himself was aware, Cant. 6: 12.) to do this; no word of God shall fail.

2. He destroyed all the houses of the high places, all those synagogues of Satan that were in the cities of Samaria, v. 19. the priests he justly made sacrifices upon their own altars, v. 20.

3. He carefully preserved the sepulchre of that man of God, who came from Judah to foretell this.

Lastly, We are here told what a solemn passover Josiah and his people kept, after all this. When they had cleared the country of the old leaven, then they applied themselves to the keeping of the feast; the way to keep out all abominable customs, is to keep up all instituted ordinances; (see Lev. 18: 30.) therefore he commanded all the people to keep the passover, which was not only a memorial of their deliverance out of Egypt, but a token of their dedication to Him that brought them out, and their communion with Him: this he found written in the book of the law, here called the book of the covenant; for though the divine authority may deal with us in a way of absolute command, divine grace condescends to federal transactions, and therefore he observed it. We have not such a particular account of this passover as of that in Hezekiah's time, 2 Chr. 30: but, in general, that there was not holden such a passover in any of the foregoing reigns, no not from the days of the Judges, v. 22. which, by the way, intimates that though the account which the book of Judges gives of the state of Israel under that dynasty, looks but melancholy, yet there were then some golden days. We have reason to think, that, during all the remainder of Josiah's reign, religion flourished, and the feasts of the Lord were very carefully observed; but in this passover, the satisfaction they took in the covenant lately renewed, the reformation in pursuance of it, and the revival of an ordinance of which they had lately found the divine original in the book of the law, and which had long been neglected or carelessly kept, put them into transports of holy joy; and God was pleased to recompense their zeal in destroying idolatry, with uncommon tokens of his presence and favor; all this concurred to make it a distinguished passover.

V. 25—30. Upon the reading of these vs. we must say, Lord, though thy righteousness be as the great mountains, evident, conspicuous, and past dispute, yet thy judgments are a great deep, unfathomable, and past finding out, Ps. 36: 6. What shall we say to this?

I. It is here owned, that Josiah was one of the best kings that ever sat on the throne of David, v. 25. As Hezekiah was a nonesuch for faith and dependence on God in straits, ch. 18: 5. so Josiah was a nonesuch for sincerity and zeal in carrying on a work of reformation. It is true religion to turn to God, as one we have chosen and love. He did what he could to turn his kingdom also to the Lord. He did it with all his heart, soul, and might; with vigor, courage and resolution: he could not otherwise have broken through the difficulties he had to grapple with. What great things may we bring to pass in the service of God, if we be but lively and hearty in it! He did this, according to all the law of Moses; in an exact observance of that law, and with an actual regard to it. His zeal did not transport him into any irregularities.

II. Notwithstanding this, he was cut off by a violent death, in the midst of his days, and his kingdom was ruined a few years after. Consequent on such a reformation, one would have expected nothing but the prosperity and glory both of king and kingdom; but,

1. Even the reformed kingdom continues marked for ruin, v. 26. That is certainly true, which God spake by the prophet, Jer. 18: 7, 8. That if a nation, doomed to destruction, turn from the evil of sin, God will repent of the evil of punishment; therefore we must conclude that Josiah's people, though they submitted to his power, did not heartily imbibe his principles, but still continued their affection for idols; therefore He, who knows men's hearts, would not recall that sentence. That Judah should be removed, as Israel, and Jerusalem itself cast off, v. 27. Yet even this destruction was intended to be their effectual reformation, so that this shall be all the fruit, even the taking away of sin.

2. As an evidence of this, even the reforming king is cut off in the midst of his usefulness, in mercy to him, that he might not see the evil which was coming on his kingdom; but in wrath to his people, for his death was an inlet to their desolations. Here, (1.) We cannot justify Josiah's conduct; he had no clear call to engage in this war between the king of Egypt and the king of Assyria, (so the king of Babylon is called,) nor do we find that he asked counsel of God by Urim, or prophets, concerning it. Some understand the promise made to him, That he should come to his grave in peace, in a sense in which it was not performed, because, by his miscarriage in this matter, he forfeited the benefit of it. I understand the promise so, as that I believe it was fulfilled, for he died in peace with God and his own conscience, and saw not, nor had any immediate prospect of, the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; [there was no war nor desolation in his land. Clarke.]; yet I understand the providence to be a rebuke to him for his rashness. (2.) We must adore God's righteousness, in taking away such a jewel from an unthankful people that knew not how to value it. They greatly lamented his death, 2 Chr. 35: 25. urged to it by Jeremiah, who told them the meaning of it, and what a threatening omen it was; but they had not made a due improvement of the mercies they enjoyed by his life, of which God taught them the worth by the want.

V. 31—37. Jerusalem saw not a good day after Josiah's death, but one trouble came after another, till, within 22 years, it was quite destroyed. Of the reign of two of his sons here is a short account; the former we find here a prisoner, and the latter a tributary, to the king of

The 12 kings or nomarchs, according to Herodotus, reigned about this time, i. e. after the death of Sethos, K. at Memphis, the contemporary of Tirhakah, between 714 and 664. Jehoiakim submits to Nebuchadnezzar, but afterwards rebels, 1. God hastens the fulfilment of his predictions against Judah, 2—4. Jehoiakim dies, and is succeeded by Jehoiachin, 5, 6. The king of Babylon prevails against the king of Egypt, 7. Jehoiachin reigns wickedly, 8, 9. Jerusalem is taken; and the king, with his family and treasures, and the sacred vessels, and chief persons of Judah, is carried captive to Babylon, 10—16. Egypt, and both so in the very beginning of their reign. The king of Egypt having slain Josiah, though he had not any design on Judah, yet, being provoked by the opposition Josiah gave him, now, it should seem, bent all his force against his family and kingdom. If Josiah's sons had trodden in his steps, they would have fared the better for his piety; but deviating from them, they fared worse for his rashness.

I. Jehoahaz, a younger son, was first made king by the people of the land; probably, because he was observed to be of a more active, warlike genius than his elder brother, and likely to make head against the king of Egypt, and to avenge his father's death, which perhaps the people were more solicitous about, in point of honor, than keeping up and carrying on his father's reformation; and the issue was accordingly.

1. He did ill, v. 32. Though he had a good education, and a good example, given him, and many a good prayer, we may suppose, put up for him, yet he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, and it is to be feared, began to do so in his father's lifetime; for his reign was so short, that he could not, in that, show much of his character.

2. Doing ill, [e] no wonder he fared ill. Three months a prince, [f] then made a prisoner, so he lived and died, v. 33, 34. This Jehoahaz is that young lion, Ezek. 19: 1—4. See Jer. 22: 10—12.

II. Eliakim, another son of Josiah, was made king by the king of Egypt; it is not said in the room of Jehoahaz, (his reign was so short, that it was scarcely worth taking notice of,) but in the room of Josiah. The crown of Judah had, hitherto, always descended from a father to a son, and never, till now, from one brother to another; once, the succession had so happened in the house of Ahab, but never, till now, in the house of David.

Of this Jehoiakim we are here told, 1. That the king of Egypt made him poor, exacted from him a vast tribute, v. 33. which, with much difficulty, he squeezed out of his subjects, and gave to Pharaoh, v. 35. Formerly, the Israelites had spoiled the Egyptians, now the Egyptians spoil Israel: see what woful changes sin makes. 2. What made him poor, did not make him good; notwithstanding the rebukes of Providence, by which he should have been convinced, humbled, and reformed, he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, v. 37. and so prepared against himself greater judgments; for such God will send, if the less do not the work for which they are sent.

CHAP. XXIV. Things are here ripening for, and hastening toward, the utter destruction of Jerusalem.

V. 1—7. We have here the first mention of Nebuchadnezzar, a name which makes a great figure both in the histories, and in the prophecies, of the O. T. He was a potent prince, and a terror of the mighty in the land of the living; yet his name had not been known in sacred writ, had he not been employed in the destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of the Jews.

I. He made Jehoiakim his tributary, and kept him in subjection 3 years, v. 1. Nebuchadnezzar began his reign in the 4th year of Jehoiakim; in his 8th he made him his prisoner, but restored him, on his promise of faithfulness to him; that promise Jehoiakim kept about 3 years, but then rebelled, probably, in hopes of assistance from the king of Egypt.

II. When he rebelled, he sent his forces against him to destroy his country, bands of Chaldeans Syrians, Moabites, Ammonites, who were all now in the service and pay of the king of Babylon, v. 2. and withal retained, and now showed, their ancient enmity to the Israel of God. Yet no mention is here made of their commission from the king of Babylon, but only of that from the King of kings. The Lord sent, v. 2. and at the commandment of the Lord came this upon Judah, v. 3. Many are serving God's purposes, who are not aware of it.

Two things God intended in suffering Judah to be thus harassed. 1. The punishment of the sins of Manasseh, which God now visited on the third and fourth generation. So long He waited before He visited them, to see if the nation would repent; but now he would let the world know that time will not wear out the guilt of sin, and that reprieves are not pardons. Is there any unpardonable sin but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost? This is meant of the remitting of the temporal punishment: though Manasseh repented, and we have reason to think that even the persecutions and murders he was guilty of, were pardoned, so that he

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—37. The predictions of Scripture may be so long ere they are accomplished, that the expectation of the event may seem to expire; but they will all be punctually fulfilled in their season: and it must give singular encouragement to the pious, when they find themselves evidently employed in bringing about that accomplishment.—When the sins of a collective body are come to a crisis, no human endeavors can avert the wrath of God. (Is. 57:1, 2.) The best of men may be misled into unadvised meddling with matters not properly belonging to them: but if we are habitually living by faith, and walking with God, even should we be taken away in consequence of any indiscretion, it will not prevent our dying in peace, and being received to glory.—Piety is personal, the effect of special grace. The children even of the most pious parents inherit original depravity; nor can education, instruction, or example prevent its effects, without regeneration: yet abundant encouragement is given to the diligent use of the appointed means of grace, in respect of our children. NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1. Pharaoh-nechoh, after Josiah's death, obtained a victory over the king of Babylon, and for some time retained Judea and Syria in subjection. But not long after, Nabopollazar seems to have associated his son Nebuchadnezzar with him in the kingdom, that by him the war with the Egyptians might be conducted with greater vigor. For when Daniel had been 3 years under tuition at Babylon, and had afterwards been introduced to Nebuchadnezzar, he interpreted the dream of that prince in the 2*d* year of his reign: yet Daniel had been carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar the king. (Dan. 2:1.) Two distinct dates respecting the beginning of his reign must therefore be admitted; and it appears that he was made king 2 or 3 years before his father died.—Nebuchadnezzar having obtained decisive advantages against the Egyptians, attacked Jehoiakim, as an ally of Nechoh, and, having taken him prisoner, he 'bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon;' (2 Chr. 36:6, 7.) but on his submission he released him, and carried away some of the gold and silver vessels of the temple, and some of the most considerable persons of the land. Among the latter were Daniel and his companions. (Dan. 1:1—7.) This is the first epoch of the 70 years of the Babylonish captivity. Nebuchadnezzar left Babylon in the 3d year of Jehoiakim, and he reduced that prince in his 4th year. After this, Jehoiakim served the king of Babylon 3 years, and in his 8th year he rebelled against him, about 3 years before his death. (M. R.)

COND. COMM.

Verse 2.

It is probable that Jehoiakim was thus harassed during the remainder of his days; and perhaps he was at last slain in some sally, when they approached Jerusalem; and so left unburied, or otherwise very disgracefully treated. But some think, that after the transactions here

5 Now [j] the rest of the acts of Jehoiakim, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?

B. C. 599. 6 So Jehoiakim [k] slept with his fathers: and Jehoiachin his son reigned in his stead.

7 And [l] the king of Egypt came not again any more out of his land: for the king of Babylon had taken, [m] from the river of Egypt unto the river Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt.

[Practical Observations.]

8 ¶ [n] Jehoiachin was [o] eighteen years old when he began to reign, and he reigned in Jerusalem three months. And his mother's name was Nehushta, the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem.

was delivered from the wrath to come; yet, as they were national sins, they lay still charged on the land, crying for national judgments. Perhaps, some were now living who were aiding and abetting; and the present king was guilty of innocent blood, as appears, Jer. 22: 17. See what a provoking sin murder is, how loud it cries, and how long! See what need nations have to lament the sins of their fathers, lest they smart for them. 2. The accomplishment of the prophecies, v. 2. Rather shall Judah be removed out of his sight, nay heaven and earth pass away, than any word of God fail. Threatenings will be fulfilled as certainly as promises, if the sinner's repentance prevent not.

III. The king of Egypt was likewise subdued by the king of Babylon, and a great part of his country taken, v. 7. But lately he had oppressed Israel, ch. 23: 33. now he is himself brought down, and disabled to attempt any thing for the recovery of his losses, or the assistance of his allies; he dares not come any more out of his land. Afterward, he attempted to give Zedekiah some relief, but was obliged to retire, Jer. 37: 7.

IV. Jehoiakim, seeing his country laid waste, and himself ready to fall into the enemy's hand, as it should seem, died of a broken heart, in the midst of his days, v. 6. So Jehoiakim slept with his fathers; but it is not said that he was buried with them; for, no doubt, the prophecy of Jeremiah was fulfilled, that he should not be lamented, as his father was, but buried with the burial of an ass, Jer. 22: 18, 19. [i. e.] his dead body cast out, [and left unburied,] Jer. 36: 30.

V. 8—20. This should have been the history of king Jehoiachin's reign, but, alas, it is only the history of Jehoiachin's captivity, as it is called, Ezek. 1: 2. He came to the crown, not to have the honor of wearing it, but the shame of losing it; He came in only to go out.

I. He reigned but three months, then was removed and carried captive to Babylon, as his father, it is likely, would have been, had he lived but so much longer. What an unhappy young prince, to be thus thrust into a falling house, a sinking throne! Yet this young prince reigned long enough to show that he justly smarted for his fathers' sins, for he trod in their steps, v. 9. He did nothing to cut off the entail of the curse, to discharge the encumbrance of his crown, therefore with his own iniquity that of his fathers shall come into the account.

II. The calamities that came on him, his family, and people, in the very beginning of his reign, were grievous.

1. The king of Babylon had sent his forces to ravage the country, v. 2. now he came himself, and laid siege to Jerusalem. Now the word of God was fulfilled, Deut. 28: 49, &c. The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, of fierce countenance, that shall first eat the fruit of the land, and then besiege thee in all thy gates.

2. Jehoiachin immediately surrendered at discretion; wanting the faith and piety of an Israelite, he had not the resolution of a man, of a soldier, of a prince.

3. Nebuchadnezzar rifled the treasures both of the church and state, and carried away the silver and gold of both, v. 13. Now the word of God, by Isaiah, was fulfilled, ch. 20: 17. All that is in thine house shall be carried to Babylon. Even the vessels of the temple which Solomon had made, and laid up in store to be used as the old ones were worn out, he cut off from the temple, and began to cut them in pieces; but, on second thoughts, reserved them for his own use, for we find Belshazzar drinking in them, Dan. 5: 2, 3.

4. He carried away a great part of Jerusalem into captivity, to weaken it, that he might effectually secure the dominion of it, and enrich himself with the wealth or service of those he took away: there had been some carried away, 8 years before this, in the 1st year of Nebuchadnezzar, and the 3d of Jehoiakim, among them were Daniel and his fellows. See Dan. 1: 1, 2. They had approved themselves so well, that this politic prince coveted more of them. Now he carried off, (1.) The young king himself, and his family, v. 15. and we find, ch. 25: 27—29. that, for 37 years, he continued a close prisoner. (2.) All the great men, the princes and officers, their riches tempting the enemies to make a prey of them first. (3.) All military men, the mighty men of valor, v. 14—16. (4.) All the craftsmen and smiths, who made weapons of war, according to the Philistines' policy, 1 Sam. 13: 19. In this captivity, Ezekiel the prophet was carried away, Ezek. 1: 1, 2. and Mordecai. Esth. 2: 6. This Jehoiachin was also called Jechoniah, 1 Chr. 3: 16. and, in contempt, Coniah, Jer. 22: 24. where his captivity is foretold.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. When the Lord leaves men to the blindness of their own minds, and to the lusts of their own hearts, some are infatuated to adopt and obstinately persist in the most destructive measures; and others are hurried on by ambition, avarice, or resentment, to execute on them the vengeance which had been predicted.—We are incompetent judges of the divine procedures; and ought to wait with silent patience.—Blessed be God, He pardons, to the true penitent, all personal guilt; such as commit 'the sin unto death,' however, 'it is impossible to renew unto repentance.' (Heb. 6: 4—6. 1 John, 5: 14—18.)—It is distressing for those, whose own transgressions are forgiven, to reflect that they have been the guilty occasions to others, by their examples, influence, or persuasions, of those sins, which, being continued in, the Lord will not pardon; and of which they have no power to bring them to repent. The good Lord preserve us from sin and temptation, and above all from being tempters to others! And may this reflection stir up young persons to seek and serve God without delay, lest they do that mischief, which, if they themselves live to repent, they will never be able to undo. SCOTT.

CHAP. XXV.

Jerusalem is besieged and taken; Zedekiah flees, and is made prisoner; his sons are slain, his eyes are put out, and he is carried in chains to Babylon, 1—7. The temple, palaces, and city are burned, the walls are broken down, and the remnant of the people led captive, except a small number of the poor, 8—12. The residue of the sacred vessels and treasures are carried away, 13—17. The nobles are slain at Riblah, 18—21. Gedaliah, who is left governor, being treacherously slain, the rest flee into Egypt, 22—26. After many years, Evil-merodach shows great kindness to Jehoiachin, 27—30.

AND it came to pass, [a] in the ninth year of his reign, in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, that [b] Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came, he, and all his host, against Jerusalem, and [c] pitched CHAP. XXV. Ever since David's time, Jerusalem had been a celebrated place; beautiful for situation, and the joy of the whole earth; while the book of Psalms lasts, that name will sound great. In the N. T. we read much of it, when it was, as here, ripening again for its ruin. In the close of the Bible, we read of a new Jerusalem; every thing therefore that concerns Jerusalem, is worthy our regard.

V. 1—7. We left king Zedekiah in rebellion against the king of Babylon, ch. 24: 20. contriving and endeavoring to shake off his yoke, when he was no way able to do it, nor took the right method by making God his friend first. Here are the fatal consequences.

I. The king of Babylon's army laid siege to Jerusalem, v. 1. Those that by sin have provoked God to leave them, will find that innumerable evils will compass them about. Two years this siege lasted; at first, the army retired, for fear of the king of Egypt, Jer. 37: 11. but, finding him not so powerful as they thought, they soon returned, with a resolution not to quit the city till they had mastered it.

II. During this siege, the famine prevailed, v. 3. So that, for a long time, they ate their bread by weight, and with care, Ezek. 4: 16. Thus they were punished for their gluttony and excess, their

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8—20. The gradual approach of divine judgments affords sinners space for repentance, and believers leisure to prepare for properly meeting the calamity: but it only evinces the desperate obduracy and obstinacy of those, who are not deterred from their sins by all which they witness or experience.—God delights in his ordinances, so long as they prove means of grace to those who are favored with them; but He abhors them, when they degenerate into a lifeless form: and that, which to the carnal eye appears most glorious in religious worship, is often in his account a vile abomination.— External pre-eminence, in times of public calamity, often gives the precedency in suffering; but riches, dignity, authority, and superior abilities, will assuredly increase the sinner's condemnation; for to whom much is given, of him will the more be required. Let us then neither envy nor covet such precarious advantages, but be warned to improve every talent intrusted to us. SCOTT.

destruction of the temple and city. (25:14, 15. Ezra 1:7—11. Jer. 28:3, 6. Dan. 5:1—4.) It is nowhere said, what became of the ark of the covenant, and the mercy-seat: but in some way these were destroyed; for all allow, that there was no ark in the temple built after the captivity; and it is not improbable, that at this time the gold of the ark, &c. was cut off, and taken away. This event took place in the 8th year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, (12) and forms a second epoch to be regarded in computing the duration of the captivity. (2 Chr. 36: 21. Ezra 1:1—4. Dan. 1:1, 2.)—The chief and the most useful of the people were carried to Babylon, that the land might be reduced to absolute dependence on Nebuchadnezzar. 7000 soldiers, 1000 craftsmen and smiths, and 2000 persons of superior rank, may make up the sum total, 10,000. Some learned men, however, suppose, that there were 10,000 carried captive from Jerusalem alone, besides 1,000 craftsmen and smiths; and also 7000 from the rest of the land.—Jeremiah speaks of 3,023, who seem to have been carried away the year before, out of the open country. (Jer. 52:24—30.) Among the rest, Ezekiel was at this time made a captive. (Ez. 1:1—3.) SCOTT.

'Mattaniah' signifies the gift of JEHOVAH: 'Zedekiah,' the righteousness of JEHOVAH: and the king of Babylon, by giving him this name, meant either an appeal to the justice of God against him, if he violated his engagements; or to refer to the judgments, which he had heard were denounced against Jerusalem by a righteous God. NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1—5. Jerusalem was so fortified by nature and art, that notwithstanding the enfeebled state of the inhabitants, and Nebuchadnezzar's great power and military skill, it could not be taken against it; and they built forts against it round about.

B. C. 588. 2 And the city was besieged unto the eleventh year of king Zedekiah.

3 And on [d] the ninth day of the fourth month [*] the famine prevailed in the city, and [f] there was no bread for the people of the land.

4 And [g] the city was broken up, and all the men of war [h] fled by night, by the way of the gate, between two walls, which is by the king's garden: (now the Chaldees were against the city round about:) [i] and the king went the way toward the plain.

5 And the army of the Chaldees pursued after the king, [j] and overtook him in the plains of Jericho: and all his army were scattered from him.

6 So [k] they took the king, and brought him up to the king of Babylon to [l] Riblah; and they [*] gave judgment upon him.

7 And [m] they slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, [n] and † put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and [o] bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Babylon.

8 ¶ And [p] in the fifth month, on the seventh day of the month, which is [q] the nineteenth year of king Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, came [r] Nebuzar-adan ‡ captain of the guard, a servant of the king of Babylon, unto Jerusalem:

9 And [s] he burnt the house of the LORD, and [t] the king's house, and all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great man's house, burnt he with fire.

10 And all the army of the Chaldees, that were with the captain of the guard, [u] brake down the walls of Jerusalem round about.

11 Now [x] the rest of the people that were left in the city, and the § fugitives that fell away to the king of Babylon, with the remnant of the multitude, did Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carry away.

12 But the captain of the guard [y] left of the poor of the land, to be vine-dressers and husbandmen.

13 ¶ And [z] the [a] pillars of brass that were in the house of the LORD, and the [b] bases, and the brazen sea that was in the house of the LORD, did the Chaldees break in pieces, and carried the brass of them to Babylon.

14 And [c] the pots, and the shovels, and the snuffers, and the spoons, and all the vessels of brass, wherewith they ministered, took they away.

15 And the fire-pans, and the bowls, [d] and such things as were of gold, in [*] gold, and of silver, in silver, the captain of the guard took away.

16 The two pillars, ‖ one sea, and the bases, which Solomon had made for the house of the LORD; [*] the brass of all these vessels was without weight.

17 The height of the [f] one pillar was eighteen cubits, and the chapiter upon it was brass; and the height of the chapiter three cubits; and the wreathen work, and pomegranates upon the fulness of bread, and feeding themselves without fear; at length, there was no bread for the people of the land, i. e. the common people, the soldiers, whereby they were weakened, and rendered unfit for service; now they ate their own children for want of food; see this foretold by one prophet, Ezek. 5: 10. and bewailed by another, Lam. 4: 3. &c. Jeremiah earnestly persuaded the king to surrender, Jer. 38: 17. but his heart was hardened, to his destruction.

III. At length, the city was taken by storm, v. 4. the besiegers made a breach in the wall, at which they forced their way into it; the besieged, unable any longer to defend it, endeavored to quit it, and make the best of their way; many, no doubt, were put to the sword, the victorious army being much exasperated by their obstinacy.

IV. The king, his family, and all his great men, made their escape in the night, by some secret passages which the besiegers either had not discovered, or did not keep their eye on, v. 4. But those as much deceive themselves, who think to escape God's judgments, as those who think to brave them; when God judges, He will overcome. Intelligence was given to the Chaldeans of the king's flight, and which way he was gone, so that they soon overtook him, v. 5.

1. He was brought to the king of Babylon, and tried by a council of war, for rebelling; God and man had a quarrel with him for this; see Ezek. 17: 16, &c. The king of Babylon now lay at Riblah, (between Judah and Babylon,) that he might be ready to give orders both to his court at home and his army abroad.

2. His sons were slain before his eyes, though children, that this doleful spectacle, the last his eyes were to behold, might leave an impression of grief and horror on his spirit as long as he lived; in slaying his sons, they showed their indignation at his falsehood, and, in effect, declared that neither he, nor any of his, were fit to be trusted, and therefore that they were not fit to live.

3. His eyes were put out; by this, two prophecies, that seemed to contradict one another, were both fulfilled. Jeremiah prophesied that Zedekiah should be brought to Babylon, Jer. 32: 5. 34: 3. Ezekiel prophesied that he should not see Babylon, Ezek. 12: 13.

4. He was bound in fetters of brass, and so carried to Babylon; this was for his greater disgrace; whereas common malefactors are laid in iron, (Ps. 105: 18.—107: 10.) he, being a prince, was bound with fetters of brass.

V. 8—21. We have reason to think the army of the Chaldeans were much enraged against the city for holding out with so much stubbornness, yet they did not therefore put all to fire and sword as soon as they had taken the city, (which is too commonly done in such cases,) but, about a month after, (comp. v. 8. with v. 3.) Nebuzar-adan was sent to complete the destruction; this space God gave them to repent, after all the foregoing days of his patience, but in vain; their hearts (for aught that appears) were still hardened, therefore execution is awarded to the utmost.

1. The city and temple are burnt, v. 9. It does not appear that the king of Babylon designed to send any colonies to people Jerusalem, therefore he ordered it to be laid in ashes, as a nest of rebels. At the burning of the king's house, and the houses of the great men, one cannot so much wonder; but that the house of the Lord should perish in these flames, that that holy and beautiful house should be burnt with fire, Isa. 64: 11. is very strange; that house which David prepared for, and Solomon built, at such a vast expense; that house which had the eye and heart of God perpetually upon it, 1 K. 9: 3. might not that have been snatched as a brand out of the burning? No, it must not be fire-proof against God's judgments; this stately structure must be turned into ashes, and probably the ark in it; one of the apocryphal writers does indeed tell us the prophet Jeremiah got it out, and conveyed it to a cave in mount Nebo, 2 Macc. 2: 4, 5. but that could not be, for Jeremiah was a close prisoner at that time. Verses 13—17.

(M. R.—1 K. 7:13—51. Jer. 52:17—23.) By this it appears, that Nebuchadnezzar did not purpose wholly to desolate the land; but by chapiter round about, all of brass: and like unto these had the second pillar with wreathen work.

18 ¶ And the captain of the guard took [e] Seraiah the chief priest, and [h] Zephaniah the second priest, and the three keepers of the * door:

19 And out of the city he took an † officer that was set over the men of war, and [i] five men of them that‡ were in the king's presence, which were found in the city, and the § principal scribe of the host, which mustered the people of the land, and threescore men of the people of the land that were found in the city:

20 And Nebuzar-adan captain of the guard took these, [j] and brought them to the king of Babylon to Riblah.

21 And the king of Babylon smote them, and slew them at Riblah in the land of Hamath. [k] So Judah was carried away out of their land.

[Practical Observations.]

22 ¶ And as for [l] the people that remained in the land of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had left, even over them he made [m] Gedaliah, the son of [n] Ahikam the son of Shaphan, ruler.

23 And [o] when all the captains of the armies, they and their men, heard that the king of Babylon had made Gedaliah governor, there came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, even Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and Johanan the son of Careah, and Seraiah the son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, and Jaazaniah the son of a Maachathite, they and their men.

24 And Gedaliah [p] sware to them, and to their men, and said unto them, Fear not to be the servants of the Chaldees: dwell in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, [q] and it shall be well with you.

the burning of the temple God would show how little He cares for the external pomp of his worship, when the life and power of religion are neglected; the people trusted to the temple, as if that would protect them in their sins, Jer. 7: 4. but God, by this, lets them know that when they had profaned it, they would find it but a refuge of lies.

2. The walls of Jerusalem are demolished, v. 10. as if the victorious army would be revenged on them that had kept them out so long, or, at least, prevent the like opposition another time; sin unwalls a people, and takes away their defence: these walls were never repaired till Nehemiah did it.

3. The residue of the people are carried captive to Babylon, v. 11. Most of the inhabitants had perished by sword or famine, or had made their escape when the king did, (for it is said, v. 5. His army was scattered from him,) so that there were very few left, who, with the deserters, making in all but 832 persons, as appears, Jer. 52: 29. were carried away into captivity; only the poor of the land were left behind, v. 12. to till the ground, and dress the vineyards, for the Chaldeans. Sometimes poverty is a protection; they that have nothing, have nothing to lose.

4. The brazen vessels, and other appurtenances of the temple, are carried away, those of silver and gold being most of them gone before; also those two famous columns of brass, Jachin and Boaz, which signified the strength and stability of the house of God, v. 13. When the things signified were sinned away, what should the signs stand there for? Ahaz had profanely cut off the borders of the vases, and put the brazen sea upon a pavement of stones, 2 K. 16: 17. justly therefore are the bases themselves, and the brazen sea, delivered into the enemy's hand: it is just with God to take away his ordinances from those that profane and abuse them; that curtail and depress them; some things remained of gold and silver, v. 15. which were now carried off; but most of the plunder was brass, such a vast quantity of it, that it is said to be without weight, v. 16.

5. Several of the great men are slain in cold blood; Seraiah the chief priest, the father of Ezra, (Ezra 7: 1.) the second priest, who, when there was occasion, officiated for him, three door-keepers of the temple, v. 18. the general of the army, five privy counsellors, (afterward, they made them up seven,) Jer. 52: 25. the secretary of war, or pay-master of the army, and sixty country-gentlemen who had concealed themselves in the city; these being persons of some rank, were brought to the king of Babylon, v. 19, 20. and all put to death, v. 21. These the king of Babylon's regency looked upon as most active in opposing him; but Divine Justice, we may suppose, looked upon them as ringleaders in the idolatry and impiety punished by these desolations. This completed the calamity: so Judah was carried away out of their land, about 860 years after they were put in possession of it by Joshua: now the Scripture was fulfilled, Deut. 28: 36. Sin kept their fathers forty years out of Canaan, and now turned them out: the Lord is known by those judgments, which He executes, and makes good that word which He has spoken, Amos 3: 2. You only have I known of all the families of the earth, therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities.

V. 22—29. In these verses we have,

I. The dispersion of the remaining people; the city of Jerusalem was quite laid waste; some in the land of Judah, v. 22. (no small favor at this time, Jer. 45: 5.) had their lives given them for a prey. Now see,

1. The good posture they were put into; the king of Babylon appointed Gedaliah, one of themselves, to be their governor and protector under him, a very good man, and one that would make the best of the bad, v. 22. his father Ahikam was one that countenanced and protected Jeremiah, when the princes had vowed his death, Jer. 26: 24. It is probable this Gedaliah, by advice of Jeremiah, had gone over to the Chaldeans, and approved himself so well, that the king of Babylon intrusted him with the government; he resided not at Jerusalem, but at Mizpah, in the land of Benjamin, a place famous in Samuel's time; thither those came, who had fled from Zedekiah, v. 4. and put themselves under his protection, v. 23. which he assured them of, if they would be patient and peaceable under the government of the king of Babylon, v. 24. Gedaliah, though he had not the pomp and power of a sovereign prince, yet might have been a greater blessing to them than many of their kings had been, especially having such a privy-counsellor as Jeremiah, who was now with them and interested himself in their affairs, Jer. 40: 5, 6.

2. The fatal breach made on them, soon afterward, by the death of Gedaliah, within two months after he entered on his government. The utter extirpation of the Jews, for the present, was determined, therefore it is in vain for them to think of taking root again; the whole land must be plucked up, Jer. 45: 4. yet this hopeful settlement is dashed to pieces, not by the Chaldeans, but by some of themselves: the things of their peace were so hidden from their eyes, that they knew not when they were well off, nor would believe when told. (1.) They had a good governor of their own, and him they slew, out of spite to the Chaldeans, because he was appointed by Nebuchadnezzar, v. 25. Ishmael, of the royal family, envying Gedaliah's advancement, and the happy settlement of the people under him, though he could not propose to set up himself, resolved to ruin him, and basely slew him and all his friends, both Jews and Chaldeans: Nebuchadnezzar would not, could not, have been

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21. If repeated warnings and afflictions leave the sinner's heart more obdurate than before, it is an evidence that his ruin is at hand. (Prov. 29:1.)—If rebellion against earthly princes deserve penalties so severe, as by common consent have, in all ages and nations, been inflicted on those who were guilty of that crime: who can estimate what or how much punishment is due to rebellion against our Creator, Benefactor, and Sovereign!—Surely no sight can be so distressing, as the misery of our children, when occasioned by our own misconduct!—God over-rules, and imperceptibly guides, even the anger and the resentment of men, to execute his righteous purposes for his own glory: and as He 'spared not the angels, that sinned;' as He has doomed the whole race of fallen men to the grave, and all unbelievers to hell; and as 'He spared not his own Son, but delivered Him up for us all;' we need not wonder at any desolation or miseries which, for sin, He may see good to bring on guilty nations and churches. Verses 22—26.

Nebuchadnezzar intended to preserve some inhabitants in the land; but it was the Lord's purpose that it should be desolated. (12. Jer.

25 But it came to pass [r] in the seventh month, that [s] Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, of the seed * royal, came, and ten men with him, and smote Gedaliah, that he died, and the Jews and the Chaldees that were with him at Mizpah.

B. C. 562. 26 And [t] all the people, both small and great, and the captains of the armies, arose, and came to Egypt: for they were afraid of the Chaldees.

27 ¶ And [u] it came to pass in the seven and thirtieth year of the captivity of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, on the seven and twentieth day of the month, that Evil-merodach [x] king of Babylon, in the year that he began to reign, did [y] lift up the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah out of prison;

28 And he spake † kindly to him, and set his throne above [z] the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon;

29 And [a] changed his prison-garments: and [b] he did eat bread continually before him all the days of his life.

a more mischievous enemy to their peace, than this degenerate branch of the house of David was. (2.) They were as yet in their own good land, but they forsook it, and went to Egypt for fear of the Chaldees, v. 26. The Chaldeans had reason enough to be offended at the murder of Gedaliah; but if those, that remained, had humbly remonstrated, alleging that it was only the act of Ishmael and his party, we may suppose they who were innocent of it, nay, who suffered greatly by it, would not have been punished for it; but, under pretence of this apprehension, contrary to the counsel of Jeremiah, they all went to Egypt, where it is probable they mixed with the Egyptians by degrees, and were never heard of more as Israelites. Thus was there a full end made of them by their own folly and disobedience, and Egypt had the last of them, that the last verse of that chapter of threatenings might be fulfilled, after all the rest, Deut. 28: 68. The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again. These events are more largely related by the prophet Jeremiah, ch. 40. to ch. 45. which scenes he was doomed to behold, and in which he bare a melancholy part.

II. The reviving of the captive prince; of Zedekiah we hear no more, after he was carried blind to Babylon; it is probable he did not live long, but that when he died, he was buried with some marks of honor, Jer. 34: 5. Of Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, who surrendered himself, ch. 24: 12. we are here told, that as soon as Evil-merodach came to the crown, on the death of his father Nebuchadnezzar, he released him out of prison, (where he had lain 37 years, and was now 55 years old,) spake kindly unto him, paid more respect to him than to any other of the kings his father had left in captivity, v. 28. gave him princely clothing instead of his prison-garments, maintained him in his own palace, v. 29. and allowed him a pension for himself and his family, in some measure corresponding to his rank, a daily rate for every day as long as he lived. The most miserable know not what blessed turn Providence may yet give to their affairs, nor what comforts they are reserved for, according to the days wherein they have been afflicted, Ps. 90: 15. The Jews say, that this Evil-merodach had been himself imprisoned by his own father, when he returned from his madness, for some mismanagement at that time, and that in prison he contracted a friendship with Jehoiachin, in consequence of which, as soon as he had it in his power, he showed him this kindness as a sufferer, as a fellow sufferer. Some suggest, that Evil-merodach had learned from Daniel and his fellows the principles of the true religion, and was well affected to them, and, on that account, favored Jehoiachin.

Consider this as a kind dispensation of Providence, for the encouragement of the Jews in captivity, and the support of their faith and hope concerning their enlargement in due time; this happened just about the midnight of their captivity; 36 of the 70 years were now past, and almost as many were yet behind; and now to see their king thus advanced, would be a comfortable earnest to them of their own release in due time, in the set time: unto the upright there thus ariseth light in the darkness; when therefore we are perplexed, let us not be in despair.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22—30. The secret working of Providence disappoints the politic or humane purposes of such, as purpose to spare those whom God intends to destroy: and, while some are left to their ungoverned passions, and others to their groundless fears and infatuated devices, 'His counsel shall stand, and He will do all his pleasure.'—No state of misery on earth can be called absolutely hopeless or comfortless. In hell alone this blackness of darkness is to be found for ever.—The believer in this world is, as it were, imprisoned with sins, temptations, and tribulations, sometimes for many a tedious year: but death, as the servant of Jesus Christ, comes for his enlargement. Then, the prison-door is opened, his fetters are loosed, his prison garments changed for the robes of salvation and glory; his head is lifted up, and his throne advanced above the chief of the kings of the earth; and he shall be eternally feasted on the fulness of joy, to be found in the presence and favor of the Almighty. Even here, the Savior grants to the trembling, distressed, and enslaved sinner, who trusts in Him, a blessed release from condemnation and bondage: bestows on him liberty, change of raiment, royal immunities, and heavenly provisions, day by day; intended as earnests and foretastes of the 'pleasures, at his right hand, for evermore.' In short, sin alone can hurt us, and Jesus alone can do good to sinners. SCOTT.

AN EXPOSITION,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES,

UPON THE FIRST BOOK OF CHRONICLES.

In common things, repetition is thought needless and nauseous; but in sacred things, precept must be upon precept, and line upon line. To me, says the apostle, to write the same things is not grievous, but for you it is safe, Phil. 3: 1. These books of Chronicles are, in a great measure, repetition; so are much of the second and third of the four evangelists: yet no tautologies, either here or there, no vain repetitions. We may be ready to think, that of all the books of holy Scripture, we could best spare these two of Chronicles. Perhaps we might, yet we could very ill spare them; for many most excellent useful things are in them, which we find not elsewhere. And as for what we find here, which we have already met with, 1. It might be of great use to those who lived when these books were first published, before the canon of the O. T. was completed, and its parts put together; for it would remind them of what was more fully related in the other books. Abstracts, abridgments, and references, are of use in divinity as well as law. That, perhaps, may not be said in vain, which yet has been said before. 2. It is still of use, that out of the mouth of two witnesses, every word may be established, and that, being inculcated, i may be remembered. HENRY.

'They are not to be considered merely as an abridgment of other histories with additions; but as books written with a particular view: in consistency with which, the author sometimes disregards important particulars in those accounts from which he might have compiled his work, and adheres to the design proposed; which seems to have been [among other things] to furnish a genealogical sketch of the 12 tribes, deduced from the earliest times, in order to point out those peculiarities, which were necessary to distinguish the mixed multitude, that returned from Babylon [for restoring inheritances]; to ascertain the lineage of Judah; and to reestablish them on their ancient footing.....These genealogical tables must have been highly important among the Jews. Many advantages were often dependent upon their accuracy; and those who could not prove their descent were deprived of many privileges. A regular and unpolluted lineage was especially necessary to those who aspired to the priesthood; and such as could not produce it were deemed incapable of admission to that high office.' GRAY, and HEWLETT.

The penman of these books is supposed to be Ezra, Ezra, 7: 6. It is a groundless story of that apocryphal writer, 2 Esdr. 14: 21, &c. that, all the law being burnt, Ezra was divinely inspired to write it all over again, which yet might take rise from the books of Chronicles, where we find, though not all the same story repeated, yet the names of all who were subjects of that story. These books are called in Heb. words of days; journals, or annals, because, by divine direction, collected out of some public and authentic records. The collection was made after the captivity, yet the language of the originals, written before, is sometimes retained, as 2 Chr. 5: 9. There it is unto this day; which must have been written before the destruction of the temple. The Septuagint calls it a book Paraleipomenōn, of things left, or overlooked, by the preceding historians; and several such things are in it: that nothing might be lost. In this first book, we have,

I. A collection of sacred genealogies, from Adam to David:—none of those the apostle calls endless, but we have their use and end in Christ, ch. 1—9. Divers little passages of history are here inserted, which we have not before. II. A repetition of the history of the translation of the kingdom from Saul to David, and of the triumph of David's reign, with large additions, ch. 10—21. III. An original account of the settlement David made of the ecclesiastical affairs, and his preparations for building the temple, ch. 22—29. These are words of days, of the oldest days, of the best days, of the Old Testament church. The reigns of kings, and dates of kingdoms, as well as the lives of common persons, are reckoned by days; for a little time often gives a great turn, and yet all time is nothing to eternity. HENRY.

It is generally agreed, that the books of the Chronicles were compiled by Ezra, after the Babylonish captivity; and that they consist of extracts from the public records of the Jews, and the writings of preceding prophets. Anciently, the whole formed but one book in the Hebrew Bible; but the Septuagint divide it into two, and call them The Books of things left out: yet this is less proper than the original name; for there are many repetitions of facts before recorded, as well as further historical information. These repetitions, however, must not be deemed superfluous; for most, in some degree, and some, exceedingly, elucidate the preceding history: and the few, that seem not wanted for this, are suited to connect the whole into one narration, without referring to other books; which would be peculiarly useful, when copies of the whole Scriptures were both scarce and expensive.—In the genealogies are several literal or verbal variations, from those in other parts of Scripture: but it is evident, that many persons had more than one name, and were called by one or the other indiscriminately; and the spelling and pronunciation, in most languages, change considerably in a course of years. Some variations in the numerals have already been noted; and we are sometimes constrained to allow, that, probably, a trivial error of the transcriber has taken place: but there is no variation, which in the least interferes with our faith or practice, or weakens the external or internal evidence of the divine inspiration of the Scripture in general, or of these books in particular.—It was evidently a principal design of the sacred writer, in these records, to bring into one view, and comprise in a narrow compass, whatever immediately related to the nation of Israel, to each of the twelve tribes, and to the family of David, with reference to the settlement in the land after the captivity; and to ascertain the descent of the promised Messiah.—Many things might be very plain and useful to the ancient Jews, which appear obscure and uninteresting to us. Should it be allowed, that a small part of the Scripture was profitable to the church in some ages and places, but not at all in others, it would be no impeachment of the divine wisdom and goodness: and if we cannot understand or get any benefit from certain portions; it is more reasonable to blame our own dulness, than, so much as in thought, to censure them as useless.—The sacred writer seems to have dwelt on [the subjects of the temple and priesthood] the more fully, in order to stir up a holy emulation in his contemporaries, in restoring the worship at the temple to its ancient order and purity. So that in this book, 'the man after God's own heart' shines much brighter, than in 2 Sam. and the beginning of 1 Kings.—The genealogies, given by Matthew and Luke, may be supposed to refer in many respects to those in this book. And when it is said that Zacharias was 'of the course of Abia, the reference is still more indisputable. (24: 10. Luke 1: 5.)—The prophecies contained in it coincide indeed with those in 2 Sam. and in Ps.; and therefore cannot be adduced as full proofs of its divine inspiration: but the sentiments which pervade it are perfectly scriptural; and we are sure it formed a part of the Jewish Scriptures, when our Savior and his apostles appealed to them, as 'The Oracles of God.' SCOTT.

CHAP. I. This ch. and many that follow it, repeat the genealogies we have hitherto met with in the sacred history, and put them all together, with considerable additions. We may be tempted to think it had been well if they had not been written, because, when they come to be compared with other parallel places, there are differences to be found, which we can scarcely accommodate to our satisfaction; yet we must not therefore stumble at the word, but bless God that the things necessary to salvation are plain enough. And since the wise God has thought fit to write these things to us, we should not pass them over unread. All Scripture is profitable, though not all alike profitable; and we may take occasion for good thoughts and meditations even from those parts of Scripture that do not abound, as much as other parts do, with profitable remarks. These genealogies, 1. Were then of great use, when first preserved, after the Jews' return from Babylon; as they would help them to preserve the distinction of their tribes and families, even of some of the tribes that were carried captive into Assyria. Perhaps it might invite the Jews to study the sacred writings which had been neglected, to find the names of their ancestors, and the rise of their families in them. 2. They are still of some use to illustrate the scripture-story, and especially to clear the pedigrees of the Messiah, that it might appear that our blessed Savior was, according to the prophecies which went before of Him, the Son of David, the son of Judah, the son of Abraham, the son of Adam. And now that He is come for whose sake these registers were preserved, the Jews since have so lost all their genealogies, that even that of the priests, the most sacred of all, is forgotten, and they know not of any one man in the world, that can prove himself of the house of Aaron. When the building is reared, the scaffolds are removed. When the promised Seed is come, the line that was to lead to Him, is broken off.

In this ch. we have an abstract of all the genealogies in the book of Genesis, till we come to Jacob.

V. 1—27. This paragraph has Adam for its first word, and Abraham for its last. Between the creation of the former, and the birth of the latter, were 2,000 years; almost the one half of which time Adam himself lived. We are all, by nature, the seed of Adam, branches of that wild olive. Let us see to it, that, by faith, we become the seed of Abraham, (Rom. 4: 11, 12.) that we be planted into the good olive, and partake of its root and fatness.

I. The first four vs. of this paragraph, and the last four, linked together by Shem, v. 4, 24. contain the sacred line of Christ from Adam to Abraham, and are inserted in his pedigree; the order, Luke 3: 34—38. ascends, here it descends. This genealogy proves the falsehood of that reproach, As for this man, we know not whence he is. Patrick well observes here, that a genealogy being to be drawn of the families of the Jews, this appears as the peculiar glory of the Jewish nation, that they alone were able to derive their pedigree from the first man God created, which no other nation pretended to, but abused themselves and their posterity with fabulous accounts of their originals; the Arcadians fancying they were before the moon: the people of Thessaly that they sprang from stones; the Athenians that they grew out of the earth; much like the vain imaginations some of the philosophers had of the origin of the universe. The account the holy Scripture gives both of the creation of the world and the rise of nations, carries with it as clear evidences of its own truth, as those idle traditions do of their own vanity and falsehoods.

II. All the vs. between, repeat the account of the replenishing of the earth by the sons of Noah after the flood. 1. Strangers to the church, the sons of Japhet, who were planted in the isles of the Gentiles, those western parts of the world, the countries of Europe. Of these he gives a short account, v. 5—7. because with these the Jews had hitherto had little or no dealings. 2. Enemies to the church, the sons of Ham, who moved southwards towards Africa, and those parts of Asia which lay that way. Nimrod son of Cush began to be an oppressor, probably, to the people of God in his time. But Mizraim, from whom came the Egyptians, and Canaan, from whom came the Canaanites, are both of them names of great note in the Jewish story; for with their descendants, the Israel of God had severe struggles

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. (M. R.) 'No book in the world shows the original propagation of mankind, but only the holy Scriptures. They who were ignorant of them, having nothing of true antiquity, devised senseless fables of their descent, they knew not how, nor from whom.' Patrick. SCOTT. The author of 'Helon's Pilgrimage to Jerusalem' suggests, probably from other German writers, that Cain, seceding from Adam's paternal authority, falsified through pride the account of creation, gave himself out as not only the first man, but the Creator, God, and so was worshipped by those who called themselves 'sons of men' in distinction from the Adamites, who were 'called by the name of the Lord' Gen. 4:26. 6:2, 4. and 'sons of God.' ED.

(L.) 'It is allowed that many errors have obtained in this catalogue, though the author exhibits from the Heb. archives a more complete catalogue of some tribes and families than Moses; some names too were added to them, long after the time of Ezra.' BOOTHROYD.

Verse 7.

Kittim and Dodanim.] 'The Sept. reads Rhodioi. These and other words in this list of similar terminations forming the Heb. plural, are names, not of individuals, says Geddes, but of nations. And it is to be remarked, once for all, that throughout the Heb. genealogies, the term "father," "son," "begat," and "begat other," do not always denote immediate procreation, or filiation; but extend to any distant progenitor. Thus, Laban is called "the son of Nahor," Gen. 29:5. though only his "grandson" by Bethuel. Similar instances frequently occur in the SS.' HEWLETT.

I. We shall have little to say of the Ishmaelites; their case was to represent that of the unbelieving Jews, who were rejected, (Gal. 4: 22, &c.) therefore little notice is taken of that nation. Ishmael's 12 sons are just named here, (v. 29—31.) to show the performance of the promise God made to Abraham, in answer to his prayer for him, that, for Abraham's sake, he should become a great nation, and particularly that he should beget 12 princes, Gen. 17: 20.

II. The Midianites who descended from Abraham's children by Keturah, were children of the east, (probably Job was one of them,) and were dismissed from Isaac, the heir of the promise, Gen. 25: 6. therefore they are only named here, v. 32. The sons of Jokshan, the son of Keturah, are named also, and the sons of Midian, v. 32, 33. who became most eminent, and perhaps gave denomination to all these families, as Judah to the Jews.

III. The Edomites had an inveterate enmity to God's Israel; yet, because descended from Esau the son of Isaac, we have here an account of their families, and the names of some of their famous men, v. 35. to the end. Some slight differences there are between some of the names here, and as we had them, Gen. 36. whence this whole account is taken. Three or four names written with a Vau there, are written with a Jod here; probably, the pronunciation being altered, as is usual in other languages. We now write many words very differently from what they were written but 200 years ago.

Let us take occasion, from the reading of these genealogies, to think, 1. Of the multitudes that them that are his. But Israel was a chosen nation, elect in type; and no other nation, in its national capacity, was so dignified and privileged as the Jewish. This holy nation is the subject of the sacred story; therefore we are next to shake off all the seed of Abraham, but the posterity of Jacob only, which were all incorporated into one nation, and joined to the Lord, while the other descendants from Abraham, for aught that appears, were estranged both from God, and from one another.

V. 28—54. All nations, but the seed of Abraham, are already shaken off from this genealogy. The Lord's portion is his people, them He keeps account of; but strangers, He beholds afar off. Not that therefore no particular persons of any other nation, but the seed of Abraham, found favor with God. It was a truth before Peter perceived it, that in every nation he that feared God, and wrought righteousness, was accepted of Him. Multitudes will be brought to heaven out of all nations, (Rev. 7: 9.) and we are willing to hope there were many, very many, good people in the world, out of the pale of God's covenant of peculiarity with Abraham, whose names were in the book of life, though not descended from any of the following families written in this book. The Lord knows have gone through this world, acted their part in it, and then quitted it. Job, even in his early day, saw not only every man drawing after him, but innumerable before him. All these, and all theirs, had their day, many of them made a mighty noise and figure in the world; but their day came to fall, and their place knew them no more. The paths of death are trodden paths, but none can retrace their steps. 2. Of the providence of God, which keeps up the generations of men, and so preserves that degenerate race, though guilty, and obnoxious, in being on earth. How easily could He cut it off, without either a deluge or a conflagration! Write but all the children of men childless, as some are, and, in a few years, the earth will be eased of its burden under which it groans; but the divine patience lets the trees that cumber the ground, not only grow, but propagate. Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it.

CHAP. II. We are now come to what was principally intended, the register of the children of Israel, that distinguished people, that were to dwell alone, and not to be reckoned among the nations. The best exposition we can give of this and the following chs. and which will give the clearest view of them, is, those genealogical tables which were published with some of the first impressions of the last English Bible about a hundred years ago, and continued for some time; and it is pity but they were revived in some of our later editions; for they are of great use to those who diligently search the Scriptures. They are said to be drawn up by that great master in scripture learning, Mr. Hugh Broughton. We meet with them sometimes in old Bibles.

V. 1—17. Here is,

1. The family of Jacob. His twelve sons are here named, that illustrious number so often celebrated almost throughout the whole Bible. At every turn, we meet with the twelve tribes that descended from these twelve patriarchs. The personal character of several of them was none of the best, (the first four were much blemished,) yet the covenant was entailed on their seed: for it was of grace, free grace, that it was said, Jacob have I loved: Not of works, lest any man should boast.

2. The family of Judah. That tribe was most praised, most increased, and most dignified, therefore the genealogy of it is the first and largest of them all. In the account here given, we have (1.) Some very bad. Er, Judah's eldest son, was evil, and the Lord slew him, v. 3. His next brother, Onan, was no better; and fared no better Here is Tamar, with whom Judah, her father-in-law, committed incest, v. 4. and Achan, called Achar, a troubler, v. 7. Note, The best and most honorable families may have those belonging to them, that have their blemishes. (2.) Some very wise and good, as Heman and Ethan, Calcol, and Dara, not, perhaps, the immediate sons of Zerah, but descendants from him, and named as being the glory of their father's house; when the Holy Ghost would magnify the wisdom of Solomon, He declares him wiser than these four men, who, though the sons of Mahol, are called Ezrahites, from Zerah, 1 K. 4: 31. That four brothers

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As we are descended from that 'one man, by whom sin and death entered into the world;' so we all resemble and imitate him: and this should remind us how sinful and frail we are; and excite us to repent, to value the Savior, to despair of happiness in this world, to seek those things which are above, and habitually to prepare to meet death, who is, to all unbelievers, 'the king of terrors.' But while we are spared, we should regard every human being, as a brother, a fellow sinner, and a fellow sufferer, without respect to climate, complexion, party, character, or even personal injuries: and, with expanded benevolence and compassion, we should aim to alleviate misery, to increase comfort, to promote peace, and to be instrumental to the salvation of men, by our example, prayers, and the improvement of our several talents. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 5, 6. M. R.—The sons of Zerah, &c. (6) It is uncertain, whether Ethan, Heman, Calcol, and Dara, the sons of Mahol, of whom we read, (1 K. 4:31.) were remote and eminent descendants of Zerah; or whether different persons, bearing nearly the same names, are there intended. SCOTT.

Verse 7.

(Josh. 7:1, 10—24.) Achan is here called Achar, or the troubler; with reference to Joshua's words to him. (Note, Josh. 7:25, 26.) Carmi is said in Joshua to be the son of Zabdi, who is here called Zimri. (6) [D and r in Heb. are much alike, and m and b are interchangeable in pronunciation among many peoples.]—The genealogies of Judah are very copious: because David, the progenitor of the Messiah, was of that tribe; and the whole nation of the Jews, to this day, is composed of such as either descended from Judah, or incorporated with those who did. Joppa.] 'Called by the Arabs Jaffa: it is the chief sea-port of Palestine. During the war of the Jews with the Romans it was burnt, but was soon rebuilt; afterwards, becoming a strong-hold of pirates, it was utterly destroyed. It was again rebuilt in the time of the crusades, and soon became a flourishing place, as being the only good harbor on the coast of Palestine: it now numbers four or five thousand inhabitants. Modern Jaffa, [see the engraving,] stands upon a conical hill or promontory, the base of which on three sides is washed by the sea: as a station for vessels, its harbor is one of the worst in the Mediterranean: and ships generally anchor about a mile from the town, in order to avoid the shoals and rocks of the place. Towards the land, the town is defended by a wall: it contains no very remarkable buildings, and the streets are narrow, irregular, and ill paved, as is the case with all oriental towns.' HORNE.

Verses 18—20.

This Caleb, or Chelubai, (9) was not the same as Caleb the son of Jephunneh, whose posterity is afterwards mentioned. (4:15.) He must have lived some time before Israel left Egypt; as Bezaleel was his great grandson; the son of Uri, the son of Hur, the son of Caleb. (M. R.) SCOTT.

Verse 21.

'The father of Gilead' means, the prince of Gilead, or the father of a large portion of the inhabitants. The term occurs frequently in this sense, throughout the subsequent genealogies; as the reader will readily perceive by consulting the M. R. (Notes, 42—58.) ID.

Verse 22.

Jair was descended by his father from Judah, and properly belonged to that tribe: but Hezron, his grandfather, married a wife of the tribe of Manasseh; and Jair, as descended from her, united himself to that tribe, and at length inherited among them. ID.

Jair seems to have taken Geshur, Aram, and some other places, from those who before possessed them. (Num. 32:39—42. Deut. 3:14. Josh. 13:29—32.) ID.

Verse 24.

Ashur was the posthumous son of Hezron, by Abiah, whom he married in his old age. (21) But he became a man of consequence; and his descendants principally peopled, or ruled over, Tekoa. ID.

Verses 34—41.

It does not appear that Sheshan had more than one daughter, whom he gave in marriage to his servant, an Egyptian; who, it is probable, was a proselyte to the true religion, and had been faithful to him. But, as a numerous progeny might spring from this one daughter, the plural number is used, as it was before observed to be in the case of sons. (Note, 8.) SCOTT.

Verses 42—49.

This Caleb, being the brother of Jerahmeel, was the same person of whom we read before. His children by Azubah and by Ephrath, had been enumerated: (18—20.) so that 'Meshah, his first-born,' seems to have been born to him by another wife, whom he married before either Azubah or Ephrath.—The Jews, when they returned from the captivity, were principally of the tribe of Judah: and so these genealogies might be exceedingly useful to them. No doubt they were extracted from ancient public records of allowed authenticity. (*M. Achsa. (49) 'Caleb, the son of Jephunneh,' had a daughter called Achsa, who was married to Othniel, at the time when Joshua completed the division of the land. (Notes, Josh. 15:16—19.) But Caleb the son of Hezron lived some ages before (Note, 18—20.) and his (HAP. III. V. 1—9. A full account of the illu rious family of David. We had an account of his sons, 2 Sam. 3: 2, &c. and 5: 14, &c. Some of them were a grief to him, as Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah. And we do not read of any of them, that imitated his piety and devotion, except Solomon, and he came far short of it. One by Bath-sheba, he called Nathan, probably, in honor of Nathan the prophet, who reproved him for his sin, and was instrumental to bring him to repentance. It is wisdom to esteem those our best friends, that deal faithfully with us. From this son of David our Lord Jesus descended, as appears, Luke 3: 31. Here are two Elishamas, and two Eliphelets, v. 6, 8. Probably, the two former were dead, therefore David called two more by their names; which he would not have done, if there had been any ill omen in it, as some fancy. David had many concubines; but their children are not named, as not worthy of the honor, v. 2. the rather, because the concubines had dealt treacherously with David in the affair of Absalom. Of all David's sons, Solomon was chosen to succeed him; perhaps not for any personal merits, (his wisdom was God's gift,) but so, Father, because it seemed good unto Thee.

V. 10—24. David having 19 sons, we may suppose them to have raised many noble families, whom we never hear of. Here we have an account only of the descendants of Solomon, and of Nathan, Luke 3. The rest had the honor to be the sons of David; these only, the honor to be related to the Messiah. The sons of Nathan were his fathers, as Man; the sons of Solomon his predecessors, as King. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No length of time will expunge the guilt or infamy of those, who do evil in the sight of the Lord, are troublers of his people, and die in their sins. But as the Savior was pleased to assume human nature, by descent through so many a heinous transgressor, and thus to be 'made in the likeness of sinful flesh,' as well as a sacrifice for sin, all manner of wickedness shall be purged away from those who believe in his name.—Atrocious sinners have in every age been transformed into the most eminent believers.—Difficulties, blemishes, and disgraces in the beginnings of life, or on the entrance of any undertaking; and remarkable blots in the origin of families; have often proved as foils to the lustre, success, or eminence, with which they were afterwards favored.—Submission to God's will is our duty and wisdom; but it is the privilege of the true believer alone to maintain this happy frame of mind.—The whole, that is truly valuable, consists in the favor, peace, and image of God; and a life spent to his glory, and in promoting the welfare of our fellow creatures. of David down to the captivity; the kings of Judah in a lineal succession; the history of whom we have had at large in Kings, and shall meet again in 2 Chr. Seldom has a crown gone in a direct line from father to son for 17 descents together, as here. This was the recompense of David's piety. About the captivity, the lineal descent was interrupted, and the crown went from one brother to another, and from a nephew to an uncle; which was a presage of the eclipsing of the glory of that house.

2. The less famous, and most of them very obscure, names, in which the house of David subsisted after the captivity. The only famous man of that house, we meet with at their return from captivity, was Zerubbabel, elsewhere called the son of Salathiel, but appearing here to be his grandson, v. 17—19. which is usual in Scripture. Belshazzar is called Nebuchadnezzar's son, but was his grandson. Salathiel is said to be the son of Jeconiah, because adopted by him, and because, as some think, he succeeded him in the dignity to which he was restored by Evil-merodach; otherwise Jeconiah was written childless: he was the signet, God plucked from his right hand, Jer. 22: 24. and in his room Zerubbabel was placed: therefore God saith to him, Hag. 2: 23. I will make thee as a signet. The posterity of Zerubbabel here bear not the same names they do in the genealogies, Matt. 1. or Luke 3. but those, no doubt, were taken from the then herald's office, the public registers which the priests kept of all the families of Judah, especially that of David.

The last person named in this ch. is Anani; of whom Patrick says the Targum adds these words, he is the king Messiah, who is to be revealed; and some of the Jewish writers give this reason, because it is said, Dan 7: 13. The Son of Man came gnim gnanani—with the clouds of heaven. The reason indeed is very foreign and far-fetched; but that learned man thinks it may be made use of as an evidence that their minds were always full of the thoughts of the Messiah, and that they expected it would not be very long after the days of Zerubbabel, before the set time of his approach would come.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—10. One reason, no doubt, why Ezra is here the most particular in the register of the tribe of Judah, is, because that tribe was it which, with its appendages, Simeon, Benjamin, and Levi, made up the kingdom of Judah; which not only long survived the other tribes in Canaan, but, in process of time, now, when this was written, returned out of captivity, when the generality of the other tribes were lost in the kingdom of Assyria.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the large families of wise, eminent, and pious men, many persons prove too insignificant to attract our notice, and others so vicious as to excite our grief and indignation. They therefore, who have no children, may hence learn submission to the will of God: for if, by that appointment, they are destitute of some comforts, they are also exempted from a variety of anxieties and trials. And those, to whom God has given children, may learn to bring up their offspring for Him to the best of their power, recommending them to his care and blessing: nor should they indulge the hope of much comfort from them, any more than seek great things for them, in this world. Yet, on the whole, the attentive and accurate observer will perceive that the posterity of the righteous enjoy advantages, sometimes for many generations, in consequence of the piety of their progenitors: so that this is the best way of laying up an inheritance for our beloved offspring.—Nothing more distinguishes the real believer from the slave of sin, than the manner in which each of them behaves towards a faithful reprover: the former, on reflection, will love and revere him as his best friend; the latter will habitually hate him as his enemy. (5. 2 Sam. 12: 1—7, 13. 1 K. 21: 20. 22: 8. Ps. 141: 5.) But all our gratitude to the instruments of our mercies should be ultimately directed to the glory of God: and all the prosperity of ourselves and our families will eventually terminate in misery, unless it centre in union with the Son of David, the King of Israel, and the Savior of sinners. Verse 16.

As the sons of Jeconiah are enumerated in the next vs. and as Zedekiah, a son of Jeconiah, is not elsewhere mentioned, it is thought by learned men, that 'his son' here means his successor. ID.

Verses 17, 18.

Many commentators take it for granted, that Salathiel, or Shealtiel, actually descended from Nathan, and was only the adoptive son of Jeconiah; that Solomon's line was extinct; and that Joseph, the husband of Mary, sprang from Nathan, as well as she. They ground this sentiment on these reasons: Jeremiah is supposed to have pronounced Jeconiah childless; but perhaps a satisfactory solution of that difficulty may be adduced. (Jer. 22:28—30.) Again, it is argued, that Luke mentions Zorobabel, the son of Salathiel, in the genealogy of Mary. But to this it may be answered, that it is scarcely the shadow of an argument to say, because a father and son are of the same names in one genealogy, as they are in another, therefore they were the same persons, when no other part of the genealogy supports, or can possibly accord with, the conclusion. Salathiel, the father of Zorobabel, mentioned by Luke, was 'the son of Rhesa, the son of Joanna, the son of Judah;' this Salathiel was the 'son of Assir, the son of Jeconiah.'—'Rhesa (Luke 3:27.) . . . is not found among the 8 children, here reckoned up.' Patrick. Matthew says, Jeconiah begat Salathiel; and it will be harsh to interpret this of mere adoption, or of less than being his progenitor; and here are several other sons, or descendants, of Jeconiah mentioned, who cannot all have been adopted. Upon the whole it scarcely admits of a doubt, that the line from Solomon to Joseph was uninterrupted; and that the two families met in Jesus, the real son of Mary, and the supposed and legal son of Joseph. (Matt. 1:2—17. Luke 3:23—38.) SCOTT.

Verses 19—24.

Perhaps Pedaiah was Salathiel's son, Jeconiah's grandson, and Zerubbabel's father: but, being of small note, his name is omitted in the other genealogies; which is a common case. Nothing is known except the names of the persons afterwards mentioned; but several of them must have lived a long time after the captivity, perhaps later than the days of Ezra. Matthew evidently deduces the line of Joseph from a different branch of the same stock: that is, from another branch of Zerubbabel's descendants. (Matt. 1:13—16.) ID.

(24.) 'This genealogy, says Geddes, deduced from David through 30 or 29 generations, gives room to conjecture the period in which the Chr. at least this part, were compiled; which must have been 13 generations after the Bab. captivity.' HEWLETT.

The most remarkable person in this paragraph is, Jabez. It is not said whose son he was; nor does it appear in what age he lived; but, it should seem, he was the founder of one of the families of Aharhel, mentioned v. 8.

Here is,

I. The reason of his name: his mother gave him the name with this reason, Because I bare him with sorrow, v. 9. All children are born with sorrow; but here, it seems, it was so extraordinary, that it was remembered when the child came to be circumcised, and care taken to perpetuate the remembrance of it while he lived. Perhaps, the mother called him Jabez, as Rachel called her son Benoni, when she was dying of the sorrow. Or, if she recovered, she recorded it, 1. As a memento to herself, to be thankful to God as long as she lived, for supporting her. It may be of use to be often reminded of our sorrows, that we may always have such thoughts of things as we had in the day of our affliction, and may learn to rejoice with trembling. 2. As a memento to him, that this world is a vale of tears, in which he must expect few days and full of trouble. The sorrow he carried in his name, might help to put a seriousness on his spirit. It might also remind him to love and honor his mother, and labor, in every thing, to be a comfort to her. It is piety thus to requite parents. 1 Tim. 5: 4.

II. The eminency of his character, v. 9. We are not told on what account he was more honorable than his brethren; we have most reason to think it was for his learning and piety; not only because these, above any thing, honor a man, but because we have reason to think Jabez was eminent in these; 1. In learning; because we find the families of the scribes dwelt at Jabez, ch. 2: 55. a city which, it is likely, took its name from him. The Jews say he was a famous doctor of the law, and left many disciples. And it should seem by the mentioning him so abruptly here, that his name was well known, when Ezra wrote this. 2. In piety; because we find here he was a praying man. His inclination to devotion made him truly honorable; and by prayer he obtained those blessings from God, which added much to his honor. The way to be truly great, is to be truly good, and to pray much.

III. The prayer he made, probably, like Solomon's for wisdom, just when he was setting out in the world. Perhaps, these were the heads on which he enlarged in his daily prayers; for this purpose, it was his constant practice to pray alone, and with his family, as Daniel. Some think it was on some particular occasion, when straitened and threatened by his enemies. Observe,

1. To whom he prayed, v. 10. to the living and true God, who alone can hear and answer prayer; and with an eye to Him as the God of Israel, a God in covenant with his people, the God with whom Jacob wrestled and prevailed, and was thence called Israel.

2. The nature of his prayer. (1.) As the margin reads it, it was a solemn vow, and then the sense is imperfect, but may easily be filled up from Jacob's vow, or some such like, then Thou shalt be my God. He does, as it were, give God a blank paper, let Him write what He pleases: 'Lord, if Thou wilt bless me and keep me, do what Thou wilt with me, I will be at thy command and disposal, for ever.' (2.) As the text reads it, it was the language of a most ardent and affectionate desire, Oh, that Thou wouldest bless me!

3. The matter of his prayer. Four things he prayed for: (1.) That God would bless him indeed. Perhaps, he had an eye to the promise of God made to Abraham, Gen. 22: 17. In blessing, I will bless thee. We can but wish a blessing, God commands it: those whom He blesses, are blessed indeed. (2.) That he would enlarge his coast; that God would enlarge our hearts, and so enlarge our portion in Himself, and in the heavenly Canaan, ought to be our desire and prayer. (3.) That God's hand might be with him. God's hand with us, to lead us, protect us, strengthen us, and to work all our works in us and for us, is indeed a hand sufficient for us, all-sufficient. (4.) That He would keep him from evil; the evil of sin, the evil of trouble, all the evil designs of his enemies, that they might not hurt, nor grieve him, nor make him a Jabez indeed, a man of sorrow. In the original, there is an allusion to his name, Father in heaven, deliver me from evil.

4. The success of his prayer. God granted him what he requested; prospered him remarkably, and gave him success in his undertakings, in his studies, in his worldly business, in his conflicts with the Canaanite; and so he became more honorable than his brethren. God was of old ready to hear prayer, and his ear is not yet heavy.

called Chelubai, and Caleb. (M. R.—2:18—20, 42—49, v. 42.) SCOTT.

Verses 2—4.

The Zorathites were the inhabitants of Zorah: but they in general descended from Shobal, or were subject to him. 'The father of Etam,' seems to imply, that the persons spoken of were the sons of one, who was lord of Etam, and progenitor of its principal inhabitants.—Hur appears to have been the grandfather of Salma, who before was called the father of Beth-lehem. (2:52, 53.) ID.

(3.) These were of the father of Etam.] 'Lit. "And these are the father of Etam, Jezreel, and Ishma and Idbash;" which is nonsense. Doubtless instead of "father" the original ms. had "sons," agreeably to all the ancient versions.' HEWLETT.

Verses 9, 10.

It must be supposed, Jabez lived soon after Israel took possession of Canaan; and when they were greatly straitened by the remains of the ancient inhabitants. He seems to have been constrained to fight against the Canaanites: but he conducted the war with faith and prayer; and he entreated the Lord to be with him, and both to enlarge his coast, and to preserve him from disastrous events, which might occasion grief unto him.—Believers, under the O. T. saw, in the land of Canaan, a type of heaven; in their wars was represented the conflict of God's people with their enemies; and every clause of his prayer may be applied to, and doubtless was intended for, more noble and spiritual blessings.—This instructive example, in the midst of genealogies, to us so abstruse, seems like the fragrant rose, surrounded by thorns; or as refreshing streams in the desert: and it appears a recompense intended for the careful student of God's word, who diligently and reverently examines the whole, comparing one part with another, without disregarding or undervaluing any. 18 And his wife † Jehudijah bare Jered [x] the father of Gedor, and Heber the father of [y] Socho, and Jekuthiel the father of Zanoah. And these are the sons of Bithiah the daughter of Pharaoh, which Mered took.

were ingenious and industrious above their neighbors, v. 14. There was a valley where they lived, which was, from them, called The valley of craftsmen. They that are craftsmen, are not therefore to be looked upon as mean men.

2. One of these married Pharaoh's daughter, v. 18. that was the common name of the kings of Egypt. If an Israelite in Egypt, before the bondage began, while Joseph's merits were yet fresh in mind, was preferred to be the king's son-in-law, it is not to be thought strange: few Israelites could, like Moses, refuse an alliance with the court.

3. Another is said to be the father of the house of them that wrought fine linen, v. 21. It is inserted in their genealogy as their honor, that they were the best weavers, and brought up their children, from one generation to another, to the same business, not aiming to make them gentlemen. This Laadah is said to be the father of them that wrought fine linen; as, before the flood, Jubal is said to be the father of musicians, and Jabal of shepherds, &c. His posterity inhabited the city of Mareshah, the manufacture or staple-commodity of which place, was, linen-cloth, with which their kings and priests were clothed.

4. Another family had had dominion in Moab, but were now in servitude in Babylon, v. 22, 23. (1.) It was found among the ancient things, that they had the dominion in Moab; probably, in David's time, when that country was conquered. (2.) Their posterity were now potters and gardeners, as is supposed, in Babylon, where they dwelt with the king for his work; got a good livelihood by their industry, and therefore cared not for returning with their brethren to their own land after the years of captivity were expired. They that now have dominion, know not what their posterity may be reduced to, nor what mean employments they may be glad to take up with. But they were unworthy the name of Israelites, that would dwell among plants and hedges, rather than be at the pains to return to Canaan.

V. 24—43. We here have some of the genealogies of the tribe of Simeon, (though not a tribe of great note,) especially the princes of that tribe, v. 38. Of this tribe it is said they increased greatly, but not like to the children of Judah, v. 27. They whom God increases, ought to be thankful, though they see others more increased.

Here observe, 1. The cities allotted them, v. 28. Of which see Josh. 19: 1, &c. When it is said, they were theirs unto the reign of David, it intimates, that, when the ten tribes revolted from the house of David, many of the Simeonites quitted these cities, because they lay within Judah, and seated themselves elsewhere.

2. The ground they got elsewhere. When those of this tribe, that revolted from the house of David, were carried captive with the rest into Assyria, those that adhered to Judah, were remarkably owned of God, and prospered in their endeavors to enlarge their coasts. In the days of Hezekiah, a generation of Simeonites, whose tribe had long crouched and truckled, was animated to make these bold efforts. (1.) Some mastered a place in Arabia, (as it should seem,) called the entrance of Gedor, inhabited by the posterity of cursed Ham, v. 40. and dwelt there This adds to the glory of Hezekiah's pious reign, that as his kingdom in general prospered, so did particular families. It is said they found fat pastures, and yet the land was quiet; even when Assyria was giving disturbance to all her neighbors, this land escaped their alarms. The inhabitants being shepherds, who molested none, were not themselves molested, till the Simeonites came and drove them out and succeeded them, not only in the plenty, but in the peace, of their land. Those who dwell (as we do) in a fruitful country, and whose land is wide, and quiet, and peaceable, have reason to own themselves indebted to that God who appoints the bounds of our habitation. (2.) Others of them, to the number of 500, under the command of 4 brethren, here named, made a descent on mt. Seir, and smote the remainder of the devoted Amalekites,

24 ¶ The sons of Simeon were, [c] Nemuel, and Jamin, [d] Jarib, [e] Zerab, and Shaul:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Children should consider how much their parents, especially their mothers, suffered for them, before they became capable of reflection; and they should endeavor in every method to requite them, as much as possible, by kindness, and by aiming to be a comfort to them, in their whole conduct. But it is basely ungrateful, (though alas! very common,) willingly to cause them still more exquisite and durable anguish, by ill-behavior.—Those events, which at first occasion most sorrow, often terminate in the greatest comfort: we should not therefore yield to despondency, but 'hope to the end,' and expect to extract good from every apparent evil.—But it is natural for us to record our sorrows rather than our mercies; though, considering our guilt and sinfulness, we may reasonably wonder that the latter are so many, and the former so few.—'The honor, which cometh from God,' is introduced by the gifts of wisdom, faith, and piety; and when these are bestowed, men will at length be honorable, whether they be renowned and prosperous, or not.—We go about our proper work in a right manner, when we use lawful and suitable means for success with all assiduity, and seek a blessing on them by fervent prayer.—A confluence of all earthly good things cannot 'bless us indeed:' the true felicity, which our hearts should eagerly desire, consists in the favor, image, and presence of God; and we should pray for this, as resolved not to depart without it.—We may very properly, with resignation, pray to be kept from the evil of suffering, which is grievous to nature; but the evil of sinning, most affrights and disquiets the spiritually minded.—In this checkered world, indeed, there is nothing durable or substantial: but possessing the hope of unchangeable felicity, we may cheerfully acquiesce in the Lord's allotment of our worldly settlements, and occupations. Nor is it desirable to advance our children much above our own rank; for those, who at one time have dominion, may at another become dependent on the worst of men for a penurious maintenance: whereas honest labor, in some regular and useful calling, best preserves that mediocrity which is most comfortable, and most advantageous to our spiritual concerns.

Verses 39—43.

Perhaps this tract belonged to the Simeonites in the division of the land, and at length they got possession of it. Some however think, that a country towards Arabia, without the borders of the promised land, is intended. It seems that the remains of the Amalekites, after the general destruction of them made by Saul and David, had settled near to the Edomites, in mount Seir: but this remnant was extirpated by a small company of Simeonites.—Some think, that the kings of Babylon permitted this part of Simeon to remain unmolested in their possessions, through the captivity, even to the time of Ezra: but perhaps Ezra extracted the words, 'unto this day,' from the ancient records without altering them.—The habitations. (41) Or, the Meunnim, or Maonites. (Heb.—Judg. 10:12. 2 Chr. 26:7.) 16 And they dwelt in Gilead in Bashan, and in her towns, and in all the suburbs of [s] Sharon, upon their † borders.

18 ¶ The sons of Reuben, and the Gadites, and half the tribe of Manasseh, of ‡ valiant men, men able to bear buckler and sword, and to shoot with bow, and skilful in war, were [x] four and forty thousand seven hundred and threescore, that went out to the war.

19 And they [y] made war with the Hagarites, with Jetur, and [z] Nephish, and Nodab.

20 And [a] they were helped against them, and the Hagarites were delivered into their hand, and all that were with them: for [b] they cried to God in the battle, and he was entreated of them; [c] because they put their trust in him.

21 And they § took away their cattle; of their camels fifty thousand, and of sheep two hundred and fifty thousand, and of asses two thousand, and of ‖ men an hundred thousand.

II. Of the tribe of Gad, some great families are here named, v. 12. Seven, children of Abihail, whose pedigree is carried upward from the son to the father, v. 14, 15. as that, v. 4, 5. is brought downward from father to son. These genealogies were perfected in the days of Jotham king of Judah, but begun some years before, in the reign of Jeroboam II. king of Israel; only it does not appear, why it was just before they were carried away captive by the Assyrians; as we read, 2 K. 15: 29, 32. When the judgments of God were ready to break out against them for their wretched degeneracy and apostasy, then were they priding themselves in their genealogies, that they were the children of the covenant; as the Jews, in our Savior's time, who, when they were ripe for ruin, boasted, We have Abraham to our father. Or, there might be a special providence in it, and a favorable intimation that though they were, for the present, cast out, they were not cast off for ever. What we design to call for hereafter, we keep an inventory of.

V. 18—26. The heads of the half tribe of Manasseh, on the other side Jordan, are named here, v. 23, 24. Their lot, at first, was Bashan; but afterward they increased so much in wealth and power, that they spread far north, even unto Hermon.

Two things only are here recorded of the tribes on the other side Jordan, in which they were all concerned. They all shared,

1. In a glorious victory over the Hagarites; so the Ishmaelites were now called, to remind them they were the sons of the bond-woman, that was cast out. We are not told when this victory was obtained: whether it be the same with that of the Reubenites, said, v. 10. to be in the days of Saul; or whether that success of one of these tribes animated and excited the other two to join them in another expedition, is not certain. It seems, though in Saul's time the common interests of the kingdom were weak and low, some of the tribes that acted separately, did well for themselves. These, (1.) Had a brave army, v. 18. How much more considerable might Israel have been than they were in the time of the judges, if all the tribes had acted in conjunction! (2.) They took the right course to engage God for them, v. 20. Now they acted as Israelites indeed. As the seed of believing Abraham, they put their trust in God. They relied not on their powerful army, but on the divine power, and the commission they had from God to enlarge their coasts, if there was occasion, by making war even with those that were very far off, beside the devoted nations. See Deut. 20: 15. They depended on God's providence to give them success. As the seed of praying Jacob, they cried unto God, especially in the battle, when, perhaps, at first, they were in danger of being overpowered. See the like done, 2 Chr. 13: 14. In distress, God expects we should cry to Him; He distrains on us for this tribute, this rent. In our spiritual conflicts, we must look up to Heaven for strength: and it is the believing prayer, that will be the prevailing prayer. (3.) We are told what success they had: God was entreated of them; God never yet failed any that trusted in Him. And then they routed the enemy's army, though far superior in number to theirs, slew many, v. 22. took 100,000 prisoners, enriched themselves greatly with the spoil, and settled themselves in their country, v. 21, 22. If the battle be the Lord's, there is reason to hope it will be successful. Then we may expect to prosper in any enterprise, and then only, when we take God along with us.

2. They shared, at length, in an inglorious captivity. Had they kept close to God and their duty, they had continued to enjoy both their an-

Verses 3—8.

Very brief extracts are made from the registers of Reuben, and of several other tribes: because, it is probable, but few persons of these tribes returned from the captivity to settle in Canaan: and therefore only a few of these tribes were concerned in the genealogies, compared with the numbers of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, of whom the Jews after that event principally consisted. It may be supposed, Ezra's contemporaries would see the reason, why the persons selected should be named, and not others; though we can assign none.—This ch. contains all that relates to the two tribes and a half, which settled E. of Jordan. Verses 18—22.

The Hagarites (10) were the descendants of Hagar, or the Ishmaelites properly so called; (M. R. 19.) and being a nation of plunderers, they would not fail to give their neighbors just cause of making war upon them. (Gen. 16:12.) If this was the same war, as was before mentioned, (10) the two tribes and half tribe beyond Jordan might be left, during a part of Saul's reign, to defend themselves: but some think that these tribes were numbered by genealogies, in the days of Jeroboam and Jotham, in order to make war against the Hagarites. (17)—The multitude of the prisoners may give an idea of the superiority in numbers of the enemy, and of the slaughter which was made.—The Ishmaelites have always been remarkable for the numbers of camels, which they take with them in their expeditions.—When we read of this conduct and success of these Israelites, we are ready to say, 'Oh, that there had' always 'been such an heart in them!' but the conclusion of the chapter gives us a different view of their character and condition. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord punishes none above their deserts; and, as He sees good, He confers unmerited favors on mankind.—They, who are related to our chief Ruler of the tribe of Judah, as his true disciples and subjects, are far more favored, than those who have a two-fold, or ten-fold, portion of perishing riches. Let us seek and choose this better portion; and leave the children of this world to contend about their gilded baubles, without envying, coveting, or interfering. We need not in that case fear wanting any thing truly good for us, 'for our Father knoweth what things we have need of:' when our families increase, He will increase our provision; and it is our privilege to cast our care on Him, and to keep in the path of duty.—Happy is that people who live together in harmony, who readily assist each other; who strenuously oppose the common enemies of their souls; and who acknowledge God in all their ways, but are especially earnest in times of trial and temptation.—And let it be carefully noticed, that all genuine and warranted trust in God will be expressed by earnest prayer; and this in part distinguishes it from a presumptuous confidence, and an indolent reliance, which often subsist without application to Him, or habitual prayer; and are especially maintained by lifeless forms, and inefficacious notions.—Those who rebel against the Lord, and apostatise from Him, must eventually be ruined: especially, such as desert his worship and reject his salvation, for the sake of those idols which are set up either in temples, or in the hearts of the avaricious, [the selfish,] the sensual, or the ambitious. It will little avail them, to have their names inserted in the genealogies of honorable families, or recorded as famous in the page of history, while rejected by God, and excluded from his kingdom.—We should consider, that those actions, which are vain, foolish, and wicked in man, may be permitted and made use of by the Lord in justice, wisdom, and goodness. From Him the renowned ravagers of the earth derive their power and courage: and they are employed as his executioners, and classed with pestilences, earthquakes, and famines; being equally dreadful and fatal to mankind.—They, whose inordinate desire of earthly objects draws them to a distance from the ordinances of God, are assuredly preparing for their own correction, or destruction. SCOTT.

Verses 25, 26.

The Manassites, with the Reubenites and Gadites, forsook God, to worship idols; and the nation of Israel generally did the same: yet, the two tribes and a half seem to have been more early and entirely corrupted, than the other tribes.—These tribes, when carried captive before the rest of Israel, (Num. 32:1—5, 29. 2 K. 15:19, 20, 29.) were placed in the same regions by Pul and Tilgath-pilneser, to which Shalmaneser afterwards carried the other tribes. (2 K. 17:5, 6. 18:9—12.) —Hara is supposed to be the same as Media, or part of it. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 4—15. 'He . . . that executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built,' (10) an intimation that the writer lived when the second temple was built or building. (2 Chr. 26:16—23.) Johanan is thought by some to have been the same as Jehoiada, the firm friend to religion and the family of David, during Athaliah's usurpation. (2 K. 11: 12: 2 Chr. 23: 24:) Otherwise Jehoiada is not mentioned.—Urijah, who basely obeyed idolatrous Ahaz, is not named in this catalogue, and perhaps several others are omitted. (M. R.)—It is wonderful, that so little is recorded of the high priests, when the office is represented in the law, and by Paul in his epistle to the Hebrews, as of a peculiar sanctity and importance. SCOTT.

(4.) Eleazar begat, &c.] 'We have no account of the high priests of the line of Ithamar, Eli and his successors, down to Abiathar, whom Solomon removed and substituted Zadok. Was this interruption considered only in regard to the discharge of the office, while the lineal descendant of Eleazar was looked upon as the real high-priest? From no mention being made of Eli, Ahitub, Ahimelech, or Ahijah, and Abiathar, of the line of Ithamar, I suspect that the above distinction obtained.' BOOTHR.

fied and distinguished with an honor more valuable than either precedency or the double portion; and that was the priesthood. This tribe God set apart for Himself; it was Moses' tribe, and perhaps for his sake was thus favored. Of that tribe we have an account in this ch.

V. 1—30. The priests and Levites were more concerned than any other Israelites, to preserve their pedigree clear, and to be able to prove it; because all the honors and privileges of their office depended on their descent. And we read of those, who, though perhaps really children of the priests, yet, because they could not find the register of their genealogies, nor make out their descent by any authentic record, were, as polluted, put from the priesthood, and forbidden to eat of the holy things, Ezra 2: 62, 63.

Very little is here recorded of the genealogies of this sacred tribe.

1. The first fathers of it are here named twice, v. 1, 16. Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, are three we were very conversant with in Numb. when the families of the Levites were marshalled, and had their work assigned them. Aaron, and Moses, and Miriam, we have known, and cannot pass here without remembering that this was that Moses and Aaron whom God honored, in making them the instruments of Israel's deliverance and settlement, and figures of Him that was to come; Moses as a prophet, and Aaron as a priest. And the mention of Nadab and Abihu (though, having no children, there was no occasion to bring them into the genealogy) cannot but remind us of the terrors of that divine justice, which they were made monuments of for offering strange fire, that we may always fear before Him.

2. The line of Eleazar, the successor of Aaron, is here drawn down to the time of the captivity, v. 4—15. It begins with Eleazar, who came out of the house of bondage in Egypt; and ends with Jehozadak, who went into the house of bondage in Babylon. Thus, for their sins, they were left as they were found; which might also intimate that the Levitical priesthood made nothing perfect: that was to be done by the bringing in of a better hope. Of Azariah it is here said, v. 10. He it is that executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built. It is supposed this was that Azariah who bravely opposed the presumption of king Uzziah when he invaded the priests' office, 2 Chr. 26: 17. though he ventured his neck by it. This was done like a priest, like one that was truly zealous for his God.

3. Some other of the families of the Levites are here accounted for. One of the families of Gershom (that of Libni) is here drawn down as far as Samuel, who had the honor of a prophet added to that of a Levite. One of the families of Merari (that of Mahli) is likewise drawn down for some descents, v. 29, 30.

V. 31—53. When the Levites were first ordained in the wilderness, much of their work lay in carrying, and taking care of, the tabernacle and its utensils. In David's time, their number was increased; and, though the greater part of them were dispersed all the nation over, to teach the people the good knowledge of the Lord; yet there was not constant work for all that attended the house of God; therefore David, by special commission and direction from God, new modelled the Levites, as we shall find in the latter part of this book. Here we are told what work he assigned them.

1. Singing work, v. 31. David was raised up to be the sweet psalmist of Israel, 2 Sam. 23: 1. not only to pen psalms, but to appoint the singing of them in the house of the Lord; (not so much because he was musical, as because he was devout;) and this he did after that the ark had rest. These singers kept up that service in the taber-

Verse 48.

'It is observable, that in all genealogies of the Levites, there is not a word said of the sons of Moses and their posterity; he having no ambition to prefer them to any office, either in church or state!' Patrick. (See on Num. 27:18.) They are indeed mentioned; but as in no respect distinguished from the other Levites. (23:14—18.) SCOTT.

the work of the place most holy, and to [t] make an atonement for Israel, according to all that [u] Moses the servant of God had commanded.

50 And these are the sons of Aaron; [v] Eleazar his son, [x] Phinehas his son, Abishua his son,

51 Bukki his son, Uzzi his son, Zerahiah his son,

52 Meraioth his son, Amariah his son, Ahitub his son,

53 [y] Zadok his son, Ahimaaz his son.

54 ¶ Now [z] these are their dwelling places, throughout their [a] castles in their coasts, of the sons of Aaron, [b] of the families of the Kohathites: for theirs was the lot.

55 And they gave them [c] Hebron in the land of Judah, and the suburbs thereof round about it.

56 But the fields of the city, and the villages thereof, they gave to Caleb the son of Jephunneh.

57 And to the sons of Aaron they gave the cities of Judah, namely, Hebron, [d] the city of refuge, and [e] Libnah with her suburbs, and [f] Jattir, and Eshtemoa, with their suburbs,

58 And [g] Hilen with her suburbs, [h] Debir with her suburbs,

59 And [i] Ashan with her suburbs, and [k] Beth-shemesh with her suburbs:

60 And out of the tribe of Benjamin; [l] Geba with her suburbs, and [m] Alemeth with her suburbs, and [n] Anathoth with her suburbs. All their cities throughout their families were thirteen cities.

61 And [o] unto the sons of Kohath, which were [p] left of the family of that tribe, were cities given out of the half tribe, namely, out of the half tribe of Manasseh, by lot, ten cities.

62 And to the sons of [q] Gershom throughout their families, out of the tribe of Issachar, and out of the tribe of Asher, and out of the tribe of Naphtali, and out of the tribe of Manasseh in Bashan, thirteen cities.

63 Unto the sons of [r] Merari were given by lot, throughout their familes, out of the tribe of Reuben, and out of the tribe of Gad, and out of the tribe of Zebulun, twelve cities.

64 And [s] the children of Israel gave to the Levites these cities, [t] with their suburbs.

65 And they gave by lot out of the tribe of the children of Judah, and out of the tribe of the children of Simeon, and out of the tribe of the children of Benjamin, [u] these cities which are called by their nacle, till the temple was built, and then they waited on their office there, v. 32.

We have here an account of the three great masters in the service, with their respective families, v. 33. Heman, Asaph, and Ethan; one of each of the three houses of the Levites, that there might be an equality.

1. Of the house of Kohath, was Heman with his family, v. 33. a man of a sorrowful spirit, if the same Heman that penned the 88th psalm, and yet a singer. He was the grandson of Samuel the prophet, the son of Joel, of whom it is said, that he walked not in the ways of Samuel, 1 Sam. 8: 2, 3. but, it seems, though the son did not, the grandson did. Thus the blessing sometimes passes over one generation, and fastens on the next. Perhaps David, in making Heman the chief, had some respect to his old friend Samuel.

2. Of the house of Gershom, was Asaph, called his brother, because in the same office, and of the same tribe, though of another family. He was posted on Heman's right hand in the choir, v. 39. Several of the psalms bear his name, either penned by him, or tuned by him, as chief musician. It is plain he was the penman of some psalms; for we read of those that praised the Lord in the words of David, and of Asaph; he was a seer, as well as a singer, 2 Chr. 29: 30. His pedigree is run up here through names utterly unknown, as high as Levi, v. 39—43.

3. Of the house of Merari, was Ethan, v. 44. who was appointed to Heman's left hand. His pedigree is also run up to Levi, v. 47. If these were the Heman and Ethan that penned the 88th and 89th psalms, there appears no reason here why they should be called Ezrahites, (see the titles of those Psalms,) as there does why those should be called so, who are mentioned ch. 2: 6. and who were the sons of Zerah.

II. There was serving work in abundance, in the tabernacle of the house of God, v. 48. to provide water and fuel; to wash and sweep, and carry out ashes: to kill and slay, and boil the sacrifices; and to all such services there were Levites appointed, those of other families, or perhaps those that were not singers, that had either no good voice, or no good ear. As every one hath received the gift, so let him minister.

III. There was sacrificing-work, but for the priest only, v. 49. They only were to sprinkle the blood, and burn the incense; as for the work of the place most holy, that was to be done by the High Priest only. Concerning the work of the priests, we are here told, 1. The end they were to have in their eye; they were to make an atonement for Israel, to mediate between the people and God; not to magnify and enrich themselves, but to serve the public. They were ordained for men, 2. Their rule; they presided in God's house, yet must do as bidden, according to all God commanded. That law the highest are subject to.

V. 54—81. We have here an account of the Levites' cities; called their castles, v. 54. not only because walled and fortified, and well-guarded by the country; (every nation is interested to protect its ministers;) but because they and their possessions were, in a particular manner, the care of the divine providence: as God was their portion, so God was their protection; and a cottage will be a castle to those that abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

This account is much the same with that we had, Josh. 21. We need not be critical in comparing them; it will not hurt the credit of the holy Scripture, if the names of some of the places be not just the same here they were there. We know it is common for cities to have several names, Sarum and Salisbury, Salop, and Shrewsbury, are more unlike than Hilen, v. 58. and Holon, Josh. 21: 15. Ashan, v. 59. and Ain, Josh. 21: 16. Alemeth, v. 60. and Almon, Josh. 21: 18. Time changes names.

We are only to observe, that in this appointment of cities for the Levites, God took care, 1 For the accomplishment of dying Jacob's prediction concerning this tribe, that it should be scattered in Israel, Gen. 49: 7. 2. For the diffusing of the knowledge of Himself and his law in all parts of the land of Israel; every tribe had Levites' cities in it; so none could be ignorant of his duty, but it was either his own fault, or the 66 And [x] the residue of the families of the sons of Kohath, had cities of their coasts, out of the tribe of Ephraim.

Levites[g]. 3. For a comfortable maintenance for those that ministered in holy things. Beside their tithes and offerings, they had glebe lands, and cities of their own to dwell in. Some of the most considerable cities of Israel fell to the Levites' lot. Every tribe had benefit by the Levites; therefore every tribe must contribute to their support. Let him that is taught in the Word, communicate to him that teacheth, and do it cheerfully.

CHAP. VII. Here is no account either of Zebulun or Dan. Why they only should be omitted, we can assign no reason; only it is the disgrace of the tribe of Dan, that idolatry began in that colony of the Danites, which fixed in Laish, and called it Dan, and there one of the golden calves was set up by Jeroboam. Dan is omitted, Rev. 7.

V. 1—19. We have here a short view,

1. Of the tribe of Issachar, whom Jacob had compared to a strong ass, couching between two burdens, Gen. 49: 14. an industrious tribe, that minded their country-business very close, and rejoiced in their tents, Deut. 33: 18. Here they appear numerous, valiant, chief men, v. 2, 3, 5. They that were inured to labor and business, were of all others the fittest to serve their country when there was occasion. The number of the respective families, as taken in the days of David, is here set down, amounting in the whole to above 145,000 men fit for war. The account, some think, was taken when Joab numbered the people, 2 Sam. 24: But I rather think it refers to some other computation made, perhaps, among themselves; because it is said, 1 Chr. 27: 24. that that account was not inserted into the chronicles of king David, it having offended God.

2. Of Benjamin. Some account is given here, but a much larger in the next ch. The militia scarcely reached to 60,000; but are said to be mighty men of valor, v. 7, 9, 11. Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf, Gen. 49: 27. It was the honor of this tribe, that it produced Saul the first king, and more its honor, that it adhered to the rightful kings of the house of David, when the other tribes revolted.

Here is mention, v. 12. of Hushim the son of Aher. The sons of Dan are said to be Hushim, Gen. 46: 23. therefore some read Aher appella-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the judgment of God, none of the human race are more honorable or valuable, than those who consistently minister in holy things. And though many, who bear this sacred character, render themselves insignificant by their indolence, contemptible by their covetousness, or odious by their profligacy, or bring the divine vengeance on themselves by offering 'strange fire before the Lord:' (Lev. 10: 1, 2.) yet, instead of that order being despised on these accounts, those who are singularly humble, diligent, disinterested, zealous, and valiant for the truth, ought to be treated with the greater respect; and of this, God Himself has condescended to set the example in his holy Word.—None of the Lord's people, and especially of his ministers, should be unemployed: they who, through want of ability, or change of circumstances, are precluded from one method of glorifying God, should set themselves to devise another. And if they deem nothing, which may conduce to the advancement of true religion, too laborious, mean, disgusting, or discouraging; if they be disposed to be 'instant in season, and out of season;' to instruct, or encourage, one, ten, or ten thousand, in public, or in private, in a cottage, an hospital, a prison, or a palace; in safe and easy, or in difficult and perilous circumstances; if they consider nothing too little to be attended to, and nothing too arduous to be attempted; and if they do all in sincerity, humility, and simplicity of spirit, they cannot long be unoccupied or useless. But, nothing can be a more pleasant and honorable work, than to excite or assist the devotions of the pious, and to lead them to abound in thanksgivings and praises to the Lord.—If a rich inheritance, or the important station of a magistrate or civil governor, could with propriety be quitted for such a service, the enlightened understanding must perceive it to be an honorable and advantageous exchange; for this is the delightful employment of those above, who are arrived at their eternal rest.—They, who have shown themselves peculiarly disinterested in the cause of God and his people, should be peculiarly considered by their brethren, and their families respected for their sakes.—While ministers are bound to wait on their ministering, according to the work of their place; the people are equally bound, in their several stations, to strengthen their hands, and to contribute without grudging to their comfortable maintenance. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—5. (M. R.) When David numbered the people, (2 Sam. 24:1—9.) the effective men of Issachar amounted to 87,000: 22,600 of whom descended from Tola his eldest son; but whether the 36,000 (4) were descendants of Tola by Uzzi; and the 22,600, his descendants by Tola's other sons; or whether another of Issachar's sons is intended, does not clearly appear: for Uzzi was the son of Tola and grandson of Issachar. Izrahiah and his five sons are spoken of as five sons of Uzzi. (3) If the former be meant, which seems the more obvious meaning, by far the greatest part of the tribe of Issachar descended from Tola. SCOTT.

Ashriel was Manasseh's eldest son by his wife, who is not named: but the whole of that numerous tribe seems to have descended from Machir: for Ashriel as the son of Manasseh is not mentioned elsewhere; and Zelophehad 'the second' was a descendant of Machir, two generations having intervened between them: for he was the son of Hepher, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir. CHAP. VIII. V. 1—32. We have some account of Benjamin in the foregoing ch. here we have a larger catalogue of the great men of that tribe; but there is little or nothing of history; we have not therefore much to observe.

1. As to the difficulties that occur in this and the foregoing genealogies, we need not perplex ourselves; some ascend, others descend; some have numbers affixed, others places; some historical remarks intermixed, others not; some are shorter, others longer; some agree with other records, others differ: those of Dan and Reuben were entirely lost. Ezra wrote as moved by the Holy Ghost; but there was no necessity for making up the defects, nor for rectifying the mistakes, of these genealogies by inspiration: it was sufficient that he copied them out as they came to his hand, or so much of them as was requisite to the present purpose, which was to direct the returned captives to settle, as near as they could, with those of their own family, and in the places of their former residence. We may suppose that many things in these genealogies, which to us seem intricate, abrupt, and perplexed, were plain and easy to them, (who knew how to fill up the deficiences,) and abundantly answered the intention of their publishing.

2. Many great and mighty nations there were now in being on earth, and many illustrious men in them, whose names are buried in perpetual oblivion, while the names of multitudes of the Israel of God are here carefully preserved in everlasting remembrance. They are Jasher, Jeshurun, just ones, and the memory of the just is blessed. Many of these, we have reason to fear, came short of everlasting honor, (for even the wicked kings of Judah come into the genealogy,) yet the perpetuating of their names here, was a figure of the friendly office, his brethren did, when they came to comfort him under this great affliction. Probably, they reminded him of the promise of increase with which Jacob had blessed him, when he laid his right hand on his head. Although his house was not so with God as he hoped, but a house of mourning, a shattered family, yet that promise was sure, 2 Sam. 23: 5.

3. The repair of this breach, in some measure, by the addition of another son to his family in his old age, v. 23. like Seth, Gen. 4: 25. When God thus restores comfort to his mourners, makes glad according to the days wherein He afflicted, setting the mercies over against the crosses, we ought therein to notice the kindness and tenderness of Divine Providence; it is as if it repented God concerning his servants. Yet, joy that a man was born into his family, could not make him forget his grief; for he gives a melancholy name to his son, Beriah, in trouble. It is good to have in remembrance the affliction and the misery, that our souls may be humbled within us, Lam. 3: 19. What name more proper for man that is born of a woman, than Beriah, because born into a troublesome world? It is added, as a further honor to the house of Ephraim, (1.) That a daughter of that tribe, Sherah by name, at the time of Israel's settling in Canaan, built some cities, either at her own charge, or by her own care; one of them bare her name, Uzzen-sherah, v. 24.

II. Of Asher. Some men of note of that tribe are here named. Their militia was not numerous, in comparison with some other tribes; but their princes were choice and mighty men of valor, chief of the princes, v. 40. perhaps it was their wisdom, not to make their trained bands numerous; but rather to have a few, apt to the war, and serviceable men.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Events frequently occur entirely beyond our expectations, and contrary to probabilities; the dispensations of Providence seem to run counter to the promises, in order that their performance may be the more observed and admired; and often a good cause is unsuccessful, while the wicked triumph in the success of their villany: but the day of judgment will clear up, and rectify, all such apparent obliquities in the divine administration.—Considering our state on earth, we may properly call all our children Beriah; (marg.) for 'man is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upwards.' But the supports, consolations, and prospects, which the Gospel brings to believers, are sufficient to counterbalance every evil, and to render both life and death tolerable, if not joyful. SCOTT.

Verse 40.

'How barren to us are these registers both of incident and interest! and yet, as barren rocks and sandy deserts make integral and necessary parts of the globe, so do these genealogical tables make necessary parts of the history of providence and grace in the maintenance of truth, and the establishment of the church of Christ. Therefore none that fear God will despise or lightly esteem them.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—5. (7:7—11.) The tribe of Benjamin adhered to Judah, in the division of the kingdom, and returned with the Jews from Babylon: and, as the history is about to open with the translation of the kingdom from Saul of that tribe, to David of Judah; we have here a more copious account given of it than of several other tribes. But either some of the sons of Benjamin had several names, or those called his sons were his more remote descendants. Gera, called his son in Genesis, is here mentioned as his grandson by Bela. (Gen. 46:21.) but the whole subsequent genealogy is obscure. (M. R.) SCOTT.

27 And Jaresiah, and Eliah, and Zichri, the sons of Jeroham.
28 These were heads of the fathers, by their generations, chief men. These [q] dwelt in Jerusalem.
29 And at Gibeon dwelt [r] the father of Gibeon, whose wife's name was Maachah:

35 And the sons of Micah were, Pithon and Melech, and [d] Tarea, and Ahaz.
B. C. 1000. 36 And Ahaz begat [e] Jehoadah; and Jehoadah begat Alemeth, and Azmaveth, and Zimri; and Zimri begat Moza,
37 And Moza begat Binea: [f] Rapha was his son, Eleasah his son, Azel his son:
38 And Azel had six sons, whose names are these, Azrikam, Bocheru, and Ishmael, and Sheariah, and Obadiah, and Hanan. All these were the sons of Azel.
39 And the sons of Eshek his brother were, Ulam his first-born, Jehush the second, and Eliphelet the third.
40 And the sons of Ulam were mighty men of valor, [g] archers, and had [h] many sons, and sons' sons, an hundred and fifty. All these are of the sons of Benjamin.

SO [a] all Israel were reckoned by genealogies; and, behold, they were written in the book of the kings of Israel and Judah, who were [b] carried away to Babylon for their transgression.

writing of the names of all God's spiritual Israel in the Lamb's book of life.

3. The tribe of Benjamin was once brought to a very low ebb, in the time of the judges, yet, in these genealogies, it makes as good a figure as almost any other of the tribes: for it is the honor of God to help the weakest, and raise up those that are most diminished and abased.

4. Here is mention of one Ehud, v. 6. In the verse before, of one Gera, v. 5. and v. 8. of one that descended from him, that begat children in the country of Moab; which inclines me to think it was that Ehud, who was the second of the judges of Israel; for he is said to be the son of Gera, and a Benjamite, Judg. 3: 15. and he delivered Israel from the oppression of the Moabites, by killing the king of Moab, which might give him a greater sway in the country of Moab than we find evidence of in his history, and might occasion some of his posterity to settle there.

5. Here is mention of some of the Benjamites that drove away the inhabitants of Gath, v. 13. Perhaps, those that had slain the Ephraimites, ch. 7: 21. or their posterity, by way of reprisal: and one of them that did this piece of justice, was named Beriah, too, that name in which the memorial of that injury was preserved.

6. Particular notice is taken of them that dwelt in Jerusalem, v. 28, 32. that they whose ancestors had had their residence there, might thereby be induced, at their return from captivity, to settle there too; which for aught that appears, few were willing to do, because it was the post of danger: therefore we find, Neh. 11: 2. The people blessed those that willingly offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem, the greater part being inclined to prefer the cities of Judah. They whose godly parents had their conversation in the new Jerusalem, should thereby be engaged to set their faces thitherward, and pursue the way thither, whatever it cost them.

V. 33—40. It is observable, that among all the genealogies of the tribes, there is no mention of any of the kings of Israel after their defection from the house of David, much less of their families; not a word of Jeroboam's house, or Baasha's, or Omri's, or Jehu's; for they were all idolaters. But the family of Saul, which was the royal family before the elevation of David, we have here a particular account of.

1. Before Saul, Kish and Ner only are named, his father and grandfather, v. 33. His pedigree is carried higher, 1 Sam. 9: 1. and there, Kish is said to be the son of Abiel, here, of Ner. He was, in truth, the son of Ner, but the grandson of Abiel; as appears by 1 Sam. 14: 51. where it is said that Ner was the son of Abiel, and Abner, who was the son of Ner, was Saul's uncle, i. e. his father's brother; therefore his father was also the son of Ner. It is common, in all languages, to put sons for grandsons, and other descendants, much more in the scanty language of the Hebrews.

2. After Saul, divers of his sons are named, but the posterity of none save Jonathan's, who was blessed with a numerous issue, and those honored with a place in the sacred genealogies, for his sincere kindness to David. The line of Jonathan is drawn down here for about ten generations. Perhaps David was, in a particular manner, careful to preserve that, and assigned it a page by itself, because of the covenant between his seed and Jonathan's for ever, 1 Sam. 20: 15, 23, 42. This genealogy ends in Ulam, whose family became famous in the tribe of Benjamin, for the number of its valiant men. Of that one man's posterity there were, as it should seem, at one time, 150 archers brought into the field of battle, mighty men of valor, v. 40.

CHAP. IX. Here we have an account of those who first took possession of Jerusalem, after their return from Babylon, and began the re-building of it on the old foundation.

V. 1—13. V. 1. looks back on the foregoing genealogies, and tells us they were gathered out of the books of the kings of Israel and Judah; not that which we have in the canon of Scripture, but another authentic civil record. Mentioning Israel and Judah, he notices their being carried away to Babylon for their transgression. Whenever we

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord delights to exalt those who have been abased; and to honor those who adhere to Him, and to the King whom He has placed upon his holy hill of Zion, to his chosen people, and to his instituted worship. Numbers of renowned names are now buried in oblivion; but as God honors some of those, who have been faithful and useful in their generation, by recording their names in the sacred Scriptures; so He writes the names of all his people in the book of life. May this be our privilege, however unnoticed in the partial histories of mankind! SCOTT

Verses 29—40.

(M. R.—9:35—44. 2 Sam. 9: 16:1—4. 19:24—30.) 'Conradus Pellicanus makes this reflection:—'That hence we may learn, it is an unnecessary labor scrupulously to inquire after these things, from which we can reap no fruit, and of which we may be ignorant without danger. Especially in the matter of these genealogies, the reason of which is long since expired, together with the tribes to which they belong. As for the certainty of our belief, which depends on the authority of the Holy Scriptures, that stands firm and constant, though some things, by the length of time, be so obscure, that they are not now exactly understood; especially in the difference we find in the proper names of persons and places, which without prejudice to the faith may be neglected.' Patrick. SCOTT.

We use cross bows so. They were very expert in shooting; 5:18.' ASSEMB. ANN.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. This verse seems to be the sacred writer's account of the book, or books, from which he had transcribed the preceding genealogies. Both Israel and Judah had been thus reckoned, or registered; and he had made extracts from the books of the two kingdoms, which had been written before the captivity. (Neh. 7:5, 6.) The ten tribes had been carried into regions at a considerable distance from Babylon: but they were, at the time to which this refers, in general subject to the kings of Babylon 2 K. 17:6. 18:11. 19:12, 13. Am. 5: 25—27.) courage and vigor of mind, as well as strength of body; therefore they are praised as mighty men of valor.

V. 14—34. We have here a further account of the good posture the affairs of religion were put into, immediately on their return out of Babylon. They had smarted for their former neglect, and late want, of ordinances; both these considerations made them now very zealous and forward in setting up the worship of God; so they began their work at the right end. For instance,

1. Before the house of the Lord was built, they had the house of the tabernacle; they that cannot yet have a temple, must not be without a tabernacle; but be thankful for that, and make the best of it. Never let God's work be left undone, for want of a place to do it in.

2. In allotting to the priests and Levites their respective employments, they had an eye to a model drawn up by David, and Samuel the seer, v. 22. Samuel laid the foundation, and David afterward finished it; both by immediate direction of God. Or David, as soon as he was anointed, had this matter in his mind, and consulted Samuel about it, though then in his troubles, and the plan was formed between them. This, perhaps, had been little regarded for many ages: but now, after a long interruption, it is revived. In dividing the work, they observed these ancient land-marks.

3. Most of them dwelt in Jerusalem, v. 34. yet some in the villages, v. 16, 22. because, it may be, there was not yet room in Jerusalem; but, however, they were employed in the service of the tabernacle, v. 25. they were to come after seven days from time to time. They had their week's attendance in their turns.

4. Many of the Levites were employed as porters at the gates of the house of God: 4 chief porters, v. 26. and, under them, to the number of 212, v. 22. They had the oversight of the gates, v. 23. were keepers of the thresholds, as it is in the margin, v. 19. and keepers of the entry. This seem-

Verse 2.

The persons who first, after the captivity, regained possession of their cities and lands, contained among them, not only Jews properly so called, but many Israelites from the other tribes; and also a number of priests, Levites, and Nethinim. (Neh. 11:1—3.)—The Nethinim were the remainder of the Gibeonites, with others perhaps joined with them, who were given as servants to the priests and Levites. The word signifies given, or, dedicated persons. (Josh. 9:27. 1 K. 9:20—22. Ezra 2:55—58. 8:20.) SCOTT.

(1, 2.) In the book of the kings.] 'Not in the canonical book or books of kings, but in the annals, journals and diaries, which each king took care to be kept with some exactness, often referred to in the preceding books; out of which this writer, under a divine direction, had taken what was proper to be continued, and had carried the genealogy down to the captivity of the 10 tribes; but the genealogy being lost with them, he could proceed no farther, nor say any more concerning them: but Judah; for so the word should be stopped, and read according to the Hebrew accents: who were carried away to Babylon for their transgression; their idolatry, and were now returned again; of these the writer proposes to give a further account.' First . . . that dwelt.] 'Who first returned. The whole body that returned were divided into 4 classes; the Israelites were the common people in general, the body politic; the priests, the ecclesiastics who officiated in sacred things; the Levites, who ministered to them; and the Nethinim were such as were given, as the word signifies, to do servile work for the sanctuary.' GILL.

Verses 3—9.

From the subsequent names of the priests and Levites, it is probable, that the sacred writer is speaking of the transactions recorded by Nehemiah; (Neh. 11:4—6.) yet the names here mentioned so differ from those in the parallel passage, that it can hardly be supposed the same persons are always meant.—But in these matters there are difficulties, which are perhaps incapable of a satisfactory solution at this distance of time, though the whole might be plain to those, for whose use it was principally intended. SCOTT.

Verses 12—18.

Several names seem to be omitted, in the genealogies of these persons, and others introduced, which are elsewhere omitted: but the names are so far the same, as to show that the transactions recorded by Nehemiah are intended. (Neh. 11:10—19. 12:1—11.) ID.

They made a business of it; remained in the chambers of the temple, that they might closely and constantly attend it; and were therefore discharged from all other services. It should seem, some companies were continually singing, at least, at stated hours, both day and night. Thus was God continually praised, as it is fit He should be, who is continually doing infinite good. Thus devout people might, at any hour, have assistance in their devotion. Thus was that temple a figure of the heavenly one, where they rest not day nor night, from praising God, Rev. 4: 8. Blessed are they that dwell in thine house, they will be still praising Thee.

It has been conjectured that the Jews, on their return from Babylon, prepared a tabernacle for the worship of the Lord, before they had courage or ability to rebuild the temple. But the inspired historian evidently spoke of the times of Nehemiah; and the temple had been finished many years before.—The word tabernacle may, therefore, refer to the sanctuary erected by Moses, which the temple, built after the captivity, more resembled, than it did Solomon's magnificent edifice. Indeed, the sanctuary at first was only a tent, or tabernacle, when Phinehas superintended it, in time past: yet 'the Lord was with him.' (Num. 3:32. 4:27,28. 31:4—6.)—This seems to have been mentioned, as an instruction and encouragement to the priests and Levites, in the times of Ezra and Nehemiah: for there can be no reasonable doubt that Phinehas the grandson of Aaron was intended.—Among numerous instances in which the Word of the LORD is used, by the Jewish paraphrasts, personally for JEHOVAH, the following may be adduced: 'In the Targum, The WORD of the LORD was his Helper.—From whence Beckius frames this argument:—That if he who was with Phinehas was JEHOVAH the true God, and this WORD was with Phinehas; then the WORD, in the opinion of this paraphrast, was JEHOVAH the true God.' Patrick. SCOTT.

Verse 23.

(M. R.) The expression here used, 'the house of the tabernacle,' is considered by many as confirming the opinion before mentioned, that a tabernacle was erected, after the captivity, till the temple was finished. (Note, 19—21.) No doubt can, I suppose, be made as to the fact: but, if the sacred historian wrote of Nehemiah's time, whatever allusion he might make to that fact; it is certain, that the temple had been completed many years before.—When David made those regulations concerning the courses and services of the Levites, there was no temple; but the ministrations were performed at the tabernacle: and perhaps on that account, 'the house of the tabernacle' is mentioned. SCOTT.

Verses 27—29.

The gold and silver vessels, and other treasures appropriated to the service of God, were deposited in the treasuries of the sanctuary; and the Levites lodged around it, as the appointed guard of them, as well as to be ready for their work. (26.20—28. Ezra 8:24—27.) ID.

Verse 30.

The Levites kept guard over the deposit of spices and frankincense, as well as over the other treasures: but the priests compounded the holy oil and incense. (Ex. 30:22—38.) It seems, however, that Bezaleel of Judah, made them in the time of Moses. (Ex. 37:1, 29.) ID.

CHAP. X. The design of Ezra, in these books of the Chronicles, was, to preserve the records of the house of David, which, though much sunk and lessened, in a common eye, by the captivity, yet grew more and more illustrious in the eyes of those that lived by faith, by the nearer approach of the Son of David. And therefore he repeats, not the history of Saul's reign, but only of his death, by which, way was made for David to the throne.

V. 1—7. This account of Saul's death, is the same with that, 1 Sam. 31: 1, &c. We need not repeat the exposition of it. Only let us observe,

1. Princes sin, and the people suffer for it: [as when rulers do well, the people are benefited by it; how much more is this just in 'popular governments.'] It was a bad time with Israel, when they fled before the Philistines, and fell down slain, v. 1. when they quitted their cities, and the Philistines came, and dwelt in them, v. 7. We do not find that they were, at this time, guilty of idolatry, as they had been before, in the days of the judges, and were after, in the days of the kings. They were reformed: yet are thus given to the spoil, and to the robbers. No doubt, there was enough in them to deserve it; but what Divine Justice had chiefly an eye to, was the sin of Saul. Note, Princes and great men should, in a special manner, take heed of provoking God's wrath; for if they kindle that fire, they know not how many may be consumed by it for their sakes.

2. Parents sin, and the children suffer for it. When the measure of Saul's iniquity was full, and his day came to fall, (which David foresaw, 1 Sam. 26: 10.) he not only descended into battle, and perished himself, but his sons (all but Ish-bosheth) perished with him, and Jonathan among the rest, that gracious, generous, man; for all things come alike to all. Thus was the iniquity of the fathers visited on the children; they fell as parts of the condemned father. Note, They that love their seed, must leave their sins, lest they perish not alone in their iniquity, but bring ruin on their families with themselves, or entail a curse on them when they are gone.

3. Sinners sin, and, at length, suffer for it themselves, though long reprieved; though sentence be not executed speedily, it will be executed. It was so on Saul; and the manner of his fall was such, as, in divers particulars, answered to his sin. (1.) He had thrown a javelin more than once at David, and missed him; but the archers hit him, and he was wounded of the archers. (2.) He had commanded Doeg to slay the priests of the Lord; and now, in despair, he commands his armor-bearer to draw his sword, and thrust him through. (3.) Him that had disobeyed the command of God, in not destroying the Amalekites, his armor-bearer disobeys, in not destroying him. (4.) He that was the murderer of the priests, is justly left to himself to be his own murderer; and his family is cut off, who cut off the city of the priest. See, and say, The Lord is righteous.

V. 8—14. Here, 1. From the triumph of the Philistines over the body of Saul, we may learn, (1.) That the greater dignity men are advanced to, the greater disgrace they are in danger of falling into. Advancement makes men a mark for malice. (2.) That if we give not to God the glory of our successes, even the Philistines will rise up in judgment against us, and condemn us; for when they had obtained a victory over Saul, they sent tidings to their idols. Poor idols, they knew not what was done a few miles off, till the tidings were brought them; nor then neither! They also put Saul's armor in the house of their gods, v. 10.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In remembering the miseries of man, we should be careful not to lose sight of his transgressions, that the justice of God in them may be acknowledged and adored.—When sinners repent, and forsake their sins, they are in the way of being extricated from trouble: and the affairs of church and state are likely to be well ordered, when men of all ranks and orders in the community concur in endeavors for that purpose.—If employed in the service of the sanctuary, we have a charge to keep, as well as a work to do; and those, who 'watch for men's souls, as they that must give account,' are intrusted with that which is unspeakably more valuable, than the richest treasures of silver and gold. They should therefore reside on the spot, as much as possible; in order to be near and ready for their work, at every hour, as occasion may require. To prepare bread for the sanctuary, in their stated public preaching, may perhaps be only expected from them every sabbath: but some parts of their work must be needful every day; and they should generally be exempted from other cares and employments, that they may give themselves wholly to the Word of God and prayer. (P. O. Acts 6: 1—7.) Blessed be his name! if indeed we be now true believers, we shall for ever, (not in rotation, but altogether,) without interruption or cessation, praise Him night and day, in his temple above. CHAP. XI. V. 1—8. David is here brought to the possession,

1. Of the throne of Israel, v. 3. Observe, (1.) God's counsels will be fulfilled at last, whatever difficulties lie in the way. If God have said, David shall rule, it is in vain to oppose it. (2.) Men that have long stood in their own light, when they have wearied themselves with their lying vanities, it is to be hoped, will understand the things that belong to their peace, and return to their own mercies. (3.) Between prince and people there is an original contract, which both ought religiously to observe. If ever any prince might have claimed an absolute, despotic power, David might, and might as safely as any have been intrusted with it; yet he covenanted with the people, and took the coronation-oath, to rule by law.

2. Of the strong hold of Zion, which was held by the Jebusites till David's time. Whether God had a particular eye on it as a place fit for a royal city, or David had a promise of it from God, it seems one of his first exploits was, to make himself master of that fort; and when he had it, he called it the city of David, v. 7. To this, reference is had, Ps. 2: 6. I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion. Opposition, (v. 5.) and pros-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord punishes none except sinners; and no sinners can escape, who do not humbly cast themselves upon his mercy: but when transgressors inquire of God, and earnestly seek deliverance in his appointed way, they will certainly prevail; and if they be involved in domestic or national calamities in this world, they will be saved from the wrath to come.—Numbers, who profess to seek the Lord, are so superficial in doing it, so soon weary of it, and so ready to listen to Satan's temptations, that God accounts it no inquiry at all. And may the good Lord deliver us from unbelief, impatience, and despair, and teach us to trust in Him; to obey and submit to his will; and to render due honor and kindness to all, whatever their behavior to us may have been!

Is it possible, more strongly to mark the excessive criminality of consulting witches, conjurors, fortune-tellers, or sorcerers of any kind, real or pretended, than by representing Saul's conduct in this respect, as one principal reason of his rejection and awful end? (M. R.—1 Sam. 28:3—10.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—3. In this recapitulation, the narrative begins with David's being submitted to, as God's appointed king, and as such anointed at Hebron, by the concurrence of the whole nation. (2 Sam. 5:1—3.) It is here added, 'according to the word of the LORD by Samuel.' (1 Sam. 13:13—15. 16:6—13.) ID.

'Kennicott has very minutely examined 2 Sam. 5. and 23. with 1 Chr. 11: He collates the chs. very carefully, pointing out the variations, correcting them as far as possible, and assigns these to their causes, considering that the discovery and correction of mistakes found in the present copies, and which appear to have arisen mostly from the negligence of transcribers, or the inattention of the translators, must restore those books nearer to the pure state in which they came from the hands of their inspired authors. By this collation he has reconciled the discrepancies which at first appear in some of the vs. and thence proceeds to give a clear testimony, that the Hebrew copies of the Scriptures are much more free from mistakes of transcription, than any other books in the world, in proportion to their size and antiquity.'

Notes, 2 Sam. 5:6—9.—Joab, &c. (6) It is evident Joab was, before this, high in authority under David; but he was, as a reward of his courage and conduct on this occasion, established commander in chief over the whole army.

[z] the chief of the mighty men whom David had, who * strengthened themselves with him in his kingdom, and with all Israel, [a] to make him king, [b] according to the word of the LORD concerning Israel.

11 And this is the number of the mighty men whom David had; [c] Jashobeam † an Hachmonite, the chief of the captains; he lifted up his spear against three hundred slain by him at one time.

12 And after him was [d] Eleazar the son of Dodo the [e] Ahohite, who was one of [f] the three mighties.

13 He was with David at [g] Pasdammim, and there the Philistines were gathered together to battle, where was a parcel of ground full of barley; and the people fled from before the Philistines.

14 And they ‡ set themselves in the midst of that parcel, and delivered it, and slew the Philistines: and [h] the LORD saved them by a great § deliverance.

15 ¶ Now three ‖ of the thirty captains went down to the rock to David, into [i] the cave of Adullam; and the host of the Philistines encamped in the valley of [l] Rephaim.

16 And David was then [m] in the hold, and [n] the Philistines' garrison was then at Bethlehem.

17 And David [o] longed, and said, Oh, that one would give me drink [p] of the water of the well of Beth-lehem, that is at the gate!

18 And the three [q] brake through the host of the Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Beth-lehem, that was by the gate, and took it, and brought it to David: but David would not drink of it, but [r] poured it out to the LORD,

19 And said, [s] My God forbid it me, that I should do this thing: [t] shall I drink the blood of these men ¶ that have put their lives [u] in jeopardy? for with the jeopardy of their lives they brought it: therefore he would not drink it. [x] These things did these three mightiest.

B. C. 1047. 20 ¶ And [y] Abishai the brother of Joab, he was chief of the three: for, lifting up his spear against three hundred, he slew them, and had a name among the three.

21 Of the three, he was more honorable than the two; for he was their captain: [z] howbeit he attained not unto the first three.

22 [a] Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, the son of a valiant man of [b] Kabzeel,  who had done many acts; he slew two [c] lionlike men of Moab: also he went down and [d] slew a lion in a pit in a snowy day.

23 And he slew an Egyptian, †† a man of great stature, [e] five cubits high, and in the Egyptian's hand was [f] a spear like a weaver's beam; and he went down to him with a staff, and plucked the spear out of the Egyptian's hand, and [g] slew him with his own spear.

24 These things did Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and had a name among the three mightiest.

25 Behold, he was honorable among the thirty, [h] but attained not to the first three: and [i] David set him over his guard.

26 ¶ Also the valiant men of the armies were [k] Asahel the brother of Joab, [l] Elhanan the son of Dodo of Beth-lehem,

27 [m] Shammoth the Harorite, Helez the [n] Pelonite,

28 [o] Ira the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite, Abiezer the [p] Antothite,

29 [q] Sibbecai the Hushathite, Ilai the [r] Ahohite,

30 [s] Maharai the Netophathite, [t] Heled the son of Baanah the Netophathite,

31 [u] Ithai the son of Ribai of Gibeah, that pertained to the children of Benjamin, Benaiah the Pirathonite,

32 [x] Hurai of the brooks of Gaash, [y] Abiel the Arbathite,

V. 10—47. We have here an account of David's worthies. The first edition of this catalogue we had, 2 Sam. 23: 8, &c. This is much the same, only those named here, from v. 41. to the end, are added. Observe,

1. The connection of this catalogue with what is said of David, v. 9. By this it appeared that God was with him, that He inclined the hearts of those to come over to him, that were able to serve his interest. David ascribed his success and increase, not to his hosts, but to the Lord of hosts; not to his mighty men, but to the mighty God, whose presence with us is all in all.

2. The title of this catalogue, v. 10. In strengthening him, they strengthened themselves, and their own interest; for his advancement was theirs. What we do in our places for the support of the kingdom of the Son of David, we shall be gainers by. It may be read, They held strongly with him, and with all Israel. Note, When God has work to do, He will not want fit instruments to do it with. If it be work that requires mighty men, mighty men shall be either found, or made, to effect it, according to the word of the Lord.

3. What made all these men honorable, was, the good service they did to their king and country, v. 10. Note, The way to be great, is, to do good. Nor did they gain this honor without labor, and the hazard of their lives. The honors of Christ's kingdom are prepared for those that fight the good fight of faith, that labor and suffer, and are willing to venture all, even life itself, for Christ and a good conscience. It is by a patient continuance in well-doing, that we must seek for glory, and honor, and immortality; and they that are faithful to the Son of David, shall find their names registered and enrolled much more to their honor, than these are in the records of fame.

4. Among all the great exploits of David's mighty men, here is nothing great mentioned concerning David himself, but his pouring out water before the Lord, which he had longed for, v. 18, 19. Four very honorable dispositions of David appeared in that action, which, for aught I know, make it as great as any of the achievements of those worthies. 1. Repentance for his own weakness. It is really an honor to a man, when he is made sensible that he has said or done any thing unadvisedly, to unsay it, and undo it again by repentance; as it is a shame to a man, when he has said or done amiss, to stand to it. 2. Denial of his own appetite. He that has such a rule as this over his own spirit, is better than the mighty. It is an honor to a man to have the command of himself; but he that will command himself, must sometimes cross himself. 3. Devotion toward God. If we have any thing better than another, let God be honored with it. 4. Tenderness of his servants. That three brave men should hazard their lives, to fetch water for him, in his account, turns the water into blood. It is the honor of great men not to be prodigal of the blood of those they employ, but, in all the commands they give them, to put their own souls into their souls' stead.

5. In the wonderful achievements of these heroes, the power of God must be acknowledged, Josh. 23: 10.

One of these is said to be an Ammonite, v. 39. another a Moabite, v. 46. and yet the law was, that an Ammonite, and a Moabite, should not enter the congregation of the Lord, Deut. 23: 3. These, it is likely, had approved themselves so hearty for CHAP. XII. What the mighty men did toward making David king, we read in the foregoing ch. Here we are told what the many did toward it. It was not all at once, but gradually, that David ascended the throne. His kingdom was to last; therefore, like fruits that keep longest, is ripened slowly: ['a thousand years scarce serve to form a state.'] After he had long waited for the vacancy of the throne, it was at two steps, and those above seven years distant, that he ascended it.

V. 1—22. We have here an account of them that appeared and acted as David's friends, on the death of Saul, to bring about the revolution. He had, while persecuted, but 600 men, those served for his guards; but when he must begin to act offensively, Providence brought more to his assistance. They that trust God to do his work for them in his own way and time, shall find his providence outdoing all their forecast and contrivance. The war was God's, and He found out helpers, whose forwardness is here recorded to their honor.

I. Some, even of Saul's brethren, of the tribe of Benjamin, and akin to him, v. 2. What moved them to it, we are not told; probably, a generous indignation at the base treatment Saul gave him. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When the time arrives for the performance of God's word, those persons who before were the most averse to the things predicted, will concur in accomplishing them.—Rulers should remember, and have need to be reminded, that they are not advanced for their own aggrandizement or self-indulgence; but that they should, with activity and vigor, provide for the defence and welfare of the nations over which they rule.—The desire of applause and pre-eminence seems to be the highest motive, of which carnal men are capable: but those, who are born from above, are actuated by purer and nobler principles. Yet, in seeking the glory of God and the good of man, by endeavoring to advance the kingdom of Jesus, the Lord's Anointed; they most effectually secure their own honor and exaltation.—The way to be truly great is to be really useful; and to give the use and glory of all our talents and services to the Lord: and if we be, at length, preserved from the destruction of the wicked, we shall perceive that the Lord has saved us with a great deliverance. May He teach us to regulate our desires, to govern our appetites, to acknowledge candidly our mistakes, and completely to rectify them when discovered; and to be gentle and tender to others, and only severe against our own sins. Verse 4.

Perhaps Saul had conferred some honorable distinction on 30 of his most valiant captains; as David afterwards did on the same number of his: and Ismaiah was placed over this illustrious company. For Ahiezer (3) seems to have been the chief of those who came to David at this time.—'I suppose, there were 30 Benjamites came over t David at one time, and this was their leader.' Patrick. SCOTT.

Verse 14.

Either these persons had the command, some over 100 men, and others over 1000, before they came to David; or he preferred them afterwards, in consideration of their services; or the passage may be understood according to the margin. ID.

Verse 15.

Perhaps, during some part of Saul's reign, the Philistines and other tribes made incursions into the land of Israel; and these resolute Gadites hastened to assist their brethren. Or perhaps they were coming to join David, in his extreme danger; and, being opposed by Saul's adherents, they put them to flight, and pursued them in every direction. ID.

16 And there came of [a] the children of Benjamin and Judah to [t] the hold unto David.

17 And David went out * to meet them, and answered and said unto them, [u] If ye be come peaceably unto me to help me, [x] mine heart shall be † knit unto you: but if ye be come to betray me to mine enemies, seeing there is no ‡ wrong in mine hands, [y] the God of our fathers look thereon, and [z] rebuke it.

18 Then [a] the Spirit § came upon [b] Amasai, who was chief of the captains, and he said, [c] Thine are we, David, [d] and on thy side, thou son of Jesse: [e] peace, peace be unto thee, and peace be to thine helpers; for [f] thy God helpeth thee. Then David received them, and made them [g] captains of the band.

[Practical Observations.]

19 ¶ And there fell some of Manasseh to David, [h] when he came with the Philistines against Saul to battle; but they helped them not: for the lords of the Philistines, upon advisement, sent him away, saying, He will fall to his master Saul ‖ to the jeopardy of our heads.

20 As he [i] went to Ziklag, there fell to him of Manasseh, Adnah, and Jozabad, and Jediael, and Michael, and Jozabad, and Elihu, and Zilthai, [k] captains of the thousands that were of Manasseh.

21 And they helped David ¶ against [l] the band of the rovers: for they were all [m] mighty men of valor, and were captains in the host.

David's title to, and fitness for, the government, that they separated themselves from their brethren, to go to him, though in the hold in the wilderness, v. 8. they were but few, 11, in all, here named, v. 8. but they added much to David's strength. Those that had hitherto come, were most of them men of broken fortunes, and soldiers of fortune, that came to him rather for protection, than service, 1 Sam. 22: 2. But these Gadites were brave men, men of war, and fit for the battle, v. 8. 1. They were able-bodied men, men of incredible swiftness, to pursue the scattered forces; and yet no man could out-fight them. 2. They were disciplined men, trained to military exercise; could handle shield and buckler, use both offensive and defensive weapons. 3. They were officers of the militia in their own tribe, v. 14. so that, though they did not bring soldiers with them, they had them at command, hundreds, thousands. 4. They were daring men, that could break through the greatest difficulties. On some expedition, perhaps this, they swam the Jordan, when it overflowed all its banks, v. 15. Those are fit to be employed in the cause of God, that venture thus in a dependence on the divine protection. 5. They were men that would go through with the business they engaged in. What enemies they were that they met with in the valleys, when they had passed Jordan, does not appear; but they put them to flight, and pursued them with matchless fury, which way soever they turned; they followed the blow, and did not do their work by halves.

III. Some of Judah and Benjamin came to him, v. 16. Their leader was Amasai; whether the same with that Amasa that afterward sided with Absalom, (2 Sam. 17: 25.) or no, does not appear. Now here we have,

1. David's prudent treaty with them, v. 17. Having been so often in danger by the treachery of the men of Ziph, and the men of Keilah, all men of Judah, no marvel he meets these men of Judah with caution. Observe how fairly he deals with them. As they are, they shall find him; so shall all that deal with the Son of David. (1.) If they be faithful and honorable, he will be their rewarder. Affection, respect, and service, that are cordial and sincere, will find favor with a good man, as they do with God, though clogged with infirmities, and turning to no great account. But, (2.) If they be false, and come to betray him to Saul, under color of friendship, he leaves them to God to be their Avenger, as He is, and will be, of every thing treacherous and perfidious. Never was man more violently run down, than David, (except the Son of David Himself,) yet he had the testimony of his conscience, that there was no wrong in his hands, which was his rejoicing in the day of evil, and committed his cause to Him that judges righteously. The God of our fathers look thereon, and rebuke it. Observe, in this appeal, [1.] He calls God, the God of our fathers, both his fathers and theirs. Thus he reminds them not to deal ill with him; for they were both descendants from the same patriarchs; both dependents on the same God. [2.] He does not imprecate any fearful judgment on them, though they should deal treacherously, but very modestly refers himself to the divine wisdom and justice. It becomes those that appeal to God, to express themselves with great temper and moderation; for the wrath of man works not the righteousness of God.

2. Their hearty closure with him, v. 18. Amasai was their spokesman, on whom the Spirit of the Lord came; not a spirit of prophecy, but of wisdom and resolution, according to the occasion, putting words into his mouth, unpremeditated, which were proper both to satisfy David, and animate those that accompanied him. Nothing could be said finer, more lively, or more pertinent to the occasion. In calling David son of Jesse, they remind themselves that he was lineally descended from Nahshon and Salmon, princes of the tribe of Judah. Saul called him so in disdain, 1 Sam. 20: 27. 22: 7. but they to his honor. They were convinced he was on God's side, and God on his; therefore Thine are we, David, and on thy side. It is good, if we must side, to side with those that side with God, and have God with them. He wishes prosperity to David and his cause, and assures him of help from heaven. From these expressions of Amasai, we may take instruction how to testify our affection and allegiance to the Lord Jesus; his we must be without reservation, or power of revocation; on his side we must be forward to appear and act; to his interest we must be hearty well-wishers: Hosanna; prosperity to his gospel and kingdom; for his God helpeth Him, and will, till He have put down all opposing rule principality and power.

3. Charity and honor teach us to let fall our jealousies, as soon as satisfaction is given us; David received them, cheerfully, into his interest and friendship, and preferred them to be captains of the band.

IV. Some of Manasseh likewise joined him, v. 19. See how Providence provides. David's interest grew strangely, just then when he had occasion to make use of it, v. 22. When the promise comes to the birth, leave it to God to find strength to bring forth.

V. 23—40. We have here an account of those who were active in perfecting the settlement of David on the throne, after the death of Ish-bosheth. We read, ch. 11: 1. and before, 2 Sam. 5: 1. that 22 For at that time, [n] day by day, there came to David to help him, until it was a great host, like [o] the host of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. Earthly princes in general honor with marked distinction such persons, as have faithfully adhered to them in seasons of difficulty and danger: [how much more shall] Jesus Christ confer peculiar honor on those, who embrace and adhere to his Gospel, in times of persecution and distress; who deny themselves, renounce their worldly interests, break through difficulties, and bear the cross, for his sake and after his example.—Courage, strength, agility, ingenuity, or superior mental endowments, are valuable to the possessors and to the community, only when, being considered as talents committed to them by the great Lord of all, they are conscientiously improved in promoting the glory of God, and the welfare of mankind: for, when misused or neglected, they prove occasions of increasing condemnation.—Long experience of the deceitfulness of mankind will teach caution to every reflecting person; but we should be afraid of growing unreasonably suspicious. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 19—40. The cause of our King appears to a carnal eye weak and obscure, and his subjects have been hitherto comparatively few: but his kingdom and glory will, ere long, rapidly advance; and his host become, like 'the host of God,' innumerable and invincible.—The advancement of wise and good men to authority, is justly considered as a cause of great and general joy; but, what a joyful time will that be, 'when all kings shall fall down before the King of Zion, and all nations shall serve Him!' Nothing short of the perfect purity and harmony of heaven, can give us a higher idea of true happiness. Meanwhile, happy are they, 'who have understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do:' who wisely perceive it to be their duty and interest, to submit to and trust in Jesus Christ the Son of David: who renounce all inconsistent connections, pursuits, and employments for his sake; and unreservedly employ all their influence and ability to promote his cause, from love to Him and to their brethren: whose love also abounds in knowledge and in all judgment, so that their beneficent endeavors are directed by heavenly wisdom, through an acquaintance with the Word of God, and a maturity of experience and observation. 'If any man lack this wisdom, let him ask it of God, and it shall be given him.' SCOTT.

first coming to Hebron: but it seems entirely to refer to his being made king over all Israel, after the death of Ish-bosheth; for there was no such union of the several tribes, on the former occasion, as is here described. (2 Sam. 2:1—4. 5:1—3.)—At that time, great numbers came to David from each of the tribes of Israel: but in different proportions, according to the degree of the cordiality and zeal of each tribe. It is probable, that so small a number of Judah was present, in order that David's own tribe, over which he had now reigned seven years, might not appear to impose a king on their brethren. There was a considerable number of Levites assembled; but not at all in proportion to the multitude of the priests, the descendants of Aaron, who appeared on this occasion under a leader named Jehoiada, probably appointed by Abiathar the high priest: while Zadok, who was afterwards high priest, being now a young man, headed a company of chief men, perhaps of the line of Eleazar. So greatly had that family increased, notwithstanding the slaughter which Saul had not long before made of them, (1 Sam. 20:6—19.) that almost 4000 attended on this occasion!—The Benjamites in general had favored the house of Saul; and numbers of them still waited for an opportunity of reviving the claim of that family, in some of its branches; for so the latter part of v. 29. may be interpreted. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. When we set out in life, or obtain any temporal advancement, we should first inquire, how we may honor God and do good, and enjoy the divine blessing, in our several situations, and in the use of our possessions!—In rectifying abuses, it is generally best to shun personal reflections and severe accusations: they appear malevolent, and excite opposition. Suffice it to show, that things needful have been neglected, and that it is proper for us to attend to them: and, in public transgressions, humility will teach a man to consider himself as in some measure guilty, and more readily to condemn himself than others.—Even good men, in doing their duty, are liable to mistakes, and to act in an improper spirit: and rebukes, though merited and needed, often excite murmurs, discouragements, and hard thoughts of God. May we then, with redoubled diligence, seek to become acquainted with the whole Word of God, and to make it 'the lantern of our path.' SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—4. Probably David consulted about bringing back the ark, immediately after he had got possession of mt. Zion, and had fixed his residence there: yet it appears, from comparing the different parts of the narrative, that he did not accomplish the design till some time after, being retarded by the incursions of the Philistines, and by other hindrances. (2 Sam. 5: 6: 1, 2.)—During Saul's reign, or the latter part of it at least, the ark had been neglected, and even David had inquired of God by the high priest at a distance from it; (1 Sam. 23:1—6, 9—13. 30:7—10. 2 Sam. 2:1—3.) while Saul concerned himself very little in any way about religion. Thus the regular way of inquiring the will of God, by the high priest, with the breast plate of judgment, before the ark in the sanctuary, had been long neglected. SCOTT.

3. We must look on all our advancements as designed for our usefulness. David's kingdom was lifted upon high, not for his own sake, that he might look great; but for his people's sake, that he might guide and protect them. We are therefore blessed, that we may be blessings. See Gen. 12: 2. We are not born, nor do we live, for ourselves.

4. It is hard to thrive, and not grow secure and indulgent to the flesh. It was David's infirmity, that when settled in his kingdom, he took more wives, v. 3. yet the numerous issue he had, added to his honor and strength. 1. Let the attack the Philistines made on David, forbid us to be secure in any settlement or advancement, and engage us to expect molestation in this world. Christ's kingdom will thus be insulted by the serpent's seed, especially when it makes any advances. 2. Let David's inquiry of God, once, and again, on occasion of the Philistines, invading him, direct us in all our ways to acknowledge God; in distress, to fly to Him; when wronged, to appeal to Him; and when we know not what to do, ask counsel at his oracles, and be, of Him to show us the right way. 3. Let David's success encourage us to resist our spiritual enemies, in observance of divine directions, and in dependence on divine strength. 4. Let the sound of the going in the top of the mulberry trees, direct us to attend God's motion, both in his providence and in the influence of his Spirit. 5. Let David's burning these gods, teach us a holy indignation against idolatry, and all the remains of it. 6. Let David's thankful acknowledgment, direct us to bring all our sacrifices of praise to 16 David therefore [g]did as God commanded him: and they smote the host of the Philistines from [h]Gibeon even to [i]Gazer.

17 And the [j]fame of David went out into all lands; and the LORD brought [k]the fear of him upon all nations.

CHAP. XV.

David prepares a place for the ark, and gives orders to the priests and Levites, about bringing it from the house of Obed-edom, 1—24. He and all the chiefs of Israel attend its removal, with sacrifices and songs of praise, 25—28. Michal despises David for dancing before the ark, 29.

AND David made him [a]houses in the city of David, [b]and prepared a place for the ark of God, and pitched for it a tent.

2 Then David said, [*]None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites: for [c]them hath the LORD chosen to carry the ark of God, and [d]to minister unto him for ever.

3 And David [e]gathered all Israel together to Jerusalem, [f]to bring up the ark of the LORD unto his place, which he had prepared for it.

4 And David assembled [g]the children of Aaron, and the Levites:

5 Of the sons of Kohath; [h]Uriel the chief, and his † brethren an hundred and twenty:

6 Of the sons of [i]Merari; Asaiah the chief, and his brethren two hundred and twenty:

7 Of the sons of Gershom; [k]Joel the chief, and his brethren an hundred and thirty:

8 Of the sons of [l]Elizaphan; [m]Shemaiah the chief, and his brethren two hundred:

9 Of the sons of [n]Hebron; Eliel the chief, and his brethren fourscore:

10 Of the sons of [o]Uzziel; [p]Amminadab the chief, and his brethren an hundred and twelve.

11 And David called for [q]Zadok and Abiathar the priests, and for the Levites, for [r]Uriel, Asaiah, and Joel, Shemaiah, and Eliel, and Amminadab,

12 And said unto them, [s]Ye are the chief of the fathers of the Levites: [t]sanctify yourselves, both ye and your brethren, that ye may bring up the ark of the LORD God of Israel unto the place that I have prepared for it.

13 For because [u]ye did it not at the first, [v]the LORD our God made a breach upon us, [x]for that we sought him not after the due order.

14 So the priests and the Levites [y]sanctified themselves, to bring up the ark of the LORD God of Israel.

15 And the children of the Levites [z]bare the ark of God upon their shoulders with the staves thereon, as Moses commanded, according to the word of the LORD.

16 And [a]David spake to the [b]chief of the Levites to appoint their brethren to be [c]the singers with the instruments of music, psalteries, and harps, and cymbals, sounding, by [d]lifting up the voice with joy.

17 So the Levites appointed [e]Heman the son of Joel; and of his

Chap. XV. The bringing in of the ark to the city of David, was a very good work; it was resolved on, ch. 13: 3. and attempted, but not perfected; it lay by the way in the house of Obed-edom. Now this ch. gives us an account of the completing of that good work.

V. 1—24. Preparation is here made to bring the ark home to the city of David, from the house of Obed-edom. It is here owned, that in the former attempt, though they sought God, yet they sought Him not after the due order, v. 13. By suffering for our irregularities, we must learn to be more regular; then we answer the end of chastisement. Let us see how the matter was mended.

1. David now prepared a place for the ark, before he brought it to him; thus he sought in due order. He pitched a tent for it, v. 1. probably, according to the pattern showed Moses in the mount, or as near it as might be, of curtains and boards. Note, Wherever we build for ourselves, we must be sure to make room for God's ark, for a church in the house.

2. David now ordered that the Levites or priests should carry the ark on their shoulders. Now he thought of what he could not but know before, that none ought to carry the ark but the Levites, v. 2. We have all smarted for your neglect: this has been by your means; see Mal. 1: 9. therefore sanctify yourselves, and mind your business. When those that suffered for doing ill, thus learn to do better, the correction is well bestowed.

3. The Levites and priests were sanctified themselves, v. 14. and ready to carry the ark on their shoulders, according to the law, v. 15. Note, Many that are very remiss in their duty, if they were but faithfully told of it, would reform, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord has so arranged matters in his providence, that all have reciprocally need of each other's assistance: thus men learn to feel their own insufficiency, and to unite in society for their common benefit. But all our advantages are from God, by whatever means or instruments they are derived to us; and we should recollect, that we possess them for the good of others, and especially for the benefit of his people.—To repress that disposition to carnal security and self-indulgence, which gathers strength by prosperity, we must expect successive conflicts and troubles. But, if we inquire of the Lord in all our difficulties, and trust in Him simply; if we use the appointed means with diligence, and obey his orders without reserve; if we break every league with sin, give no quarter to our lusts, and neither spare our own idols, nor covet those of others; and if we be disposed to give all the glory to the Lord; we shall not only be conquerors, but every conflict will increase our felicity, and add lustre to our eternal triumphs. Yet all the praise and honor will ultimately be ascribed to the Savior: his kingdom is confirmed and made very high, for the benefit of all his believing people: may his fame go forth into all lands; and may all nations fear his indignation, trust his mercy, submit to his authority, [be happy in his love,] and unite in glorifying his name! SCOTT.

NOTES.

Chap. XV. V. 1. As David had many wives and children, he had occasion to build several houses for them. (3:1—9. 2 Sam. 13:7, 20, 23. 14:24.)—Some think the tabernacle made by Moses was become ruinous, from time and neglect. About 450 years had passed since it was erected. (16:37—43. 1 K. 6:1. 8:4.) SCOTT.

Verses 12—14.

It appears from David's language to the priests and Levites, that they had before neglected to 'sanctify themselves,' by carefully avoiding, or seeking to be cleansed from, all ceremonial pollutions; by abstraction from outward indulgences; and by repentance, faith, prayer, and meditation. (Ex. 19:10—15. 2 Chr. 29:3—5, v. 5. 30:15.)—The ark had been long stationary, and the priests and Levites, through negligence, had forgotten how it ought to be removed; so that the king himself first discovered the error which had been committed, and pointed it out to them: and though he joined himself with them, as 'not having sought the LORD after the due order;' (13:9—11. 2 Sam. 6:3—11. 2 Chr. 30:16—20.) yet it is plain a large proportion of the blame belonged to them, especially to the chief persons among them. (Note, Mal. 2:4—9.) SCOTT.

Verse 15.

The Levites of the family of Kohath were appointed to carry the ark, and the priests were of that family; so that, on some occasions the priests, and on others the ordinary Levites descended from Kohath, performed this service. (Num. 4:4—16. 7:4—9. Josh. 3:3, 4. 1 K. 8:3.) ID.

do better. The breach on Uzza made the priests more careful to sanctify themselves, i. e. to cleanse themselves from all ceremonial pollution, and to compose themselves for the solemn service of God, so as to strike a reverence on the people. Some are made examples, that others may be made exemplary and very cautious.

4. Officers were appointed to be ready to bid the ark welcome, with all possible expressions of joy, v. 16. Heman, Asaph, and Ethan, were now first appointed, v. 17. And one was appointed for song, v. 22. as being skilful in it, and able to instruct others. Note, As every man has received the gift, so he ought to minister the same. And those that excel in any endowment, should not only use it, but not grudge to make others as wise as themselves. This way of praising God by musical instruments had not hitherto been in use: but David, being a prophet, instituted it by divine direction, and added it to the other carnal ordinances of that dispensation, as the apostle calls them, Heb. 9: 10. The N. T. keeps up singing of psalms, but has not appointed church music. Some were appointed to be porters, v. 18. others door-keepers for the ark, v. 23, 24. one was Obed-edom, who reckoned it, no doubt, a place of honor, and accepted it as a recompense for his entertainment of the ark.

V. 25—29. All things being got ready, we have here an account of the solemnity of this conveyance from the house of Obed-edom.

1. God helped the Levites that carried it. It is good to notice the assistance of the Divine Providence, even in those things that fall within the compass of our natural powers. In all our religious exercises, we must particularly derive help from Heaven. See Acts 26: 22. All our sufficiency for holy duties is from God. God's ministers, that bear the vessels of the Lord, have special need of divine help in their ministrations, that God in them may be glorified, and his church edified. And if God help the Levites, the people have the benefit of it.

2. When they experienced the tokens of God's presence with them, they offered sacrifices of praise to Him, v. 26. This also He helped them to do.

See an article on

'Heb. Musical Instr.' from Pfeiffer, in Nos. 19 and 20 of Bib. Repertory, 1835. The following notice of the ancient Egyptian music will assist us in forming an idea of that of the Hebrews, described in this ch. and elsewhere. 'Men and women played on the various instruments of the Egyptian band; which was composed of the harp, guitar, lyre, flute, single and double pipe, round and oblong tamborine, cylindrical maces, or clubs (probably of metal, surmounted by a head or other device, and struck together); cymbals, darabooka (a drum, still used, of parchment stretched over a circular cone of earthen ware, terminating in a cylinder like the spout of a watering-pot); trumpet, and drum, (the tomtom of India,) but these two were more peculiarly considered martial instruments, though the buffoons of the streets frequently danced to their sound. [Comp. Michal's reproach of David, as 'one of the vain fellows,' 2 Sam. 6:20. rep. in v. 29. of this ch.] Their harps were of elegant and diverse forms, of 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14, 17 and 21 strings. They had minstrels of both sexes, some played seated on the ground, [or kneeling and naked, cut, 1 Sam. 19:9.] others standing [cut, Ps. 33:2.], or sitting on a stool; and a light 4 stringed harp of smaller dimensions was sometimes carried and played on the shoulder; [comp. v. 29. and cut, 2 Sam. 6:14.] The lyre was equally varied in its form, and though Diod. limits its strings to 3, (to accord with the 3 Egyptian seasons, "the treble, summer, the base, winter and the tenor, spring,") it is found with 5, 7, and even 17; always with more than 3. It was generally held under the arm, but was sometimes supported on a stool or table. The guitar had 3, (was this Diodorus' lyre?) or 5 chords, and was played with the plectrum (occasionally without); but the drum, slung from the shoulder, was beaten by the hand at each end.'

'It is very evident the Egyptians were acquainted with the triple symphony: the harmony of instruments, that of voices, and instruments; and, though a band of choristers, who beat an accompaniment with their hands (which, at least, the modern peasants have succeeded in imitating) between each of the stanzas, must have injured the euphony, it is probable their music was of no inferior kind. Their songs were numerous, and made for certain occasions; [Champ. gives a chant for threshing grain;] and if Herodotus is to be credited, some were sung in a plaintive tone, and descended from father to son, from the early era of their first monarch. But the hymns in honor of the dead [2 Chr. 35: 25.] were of a lugubrious and less harmonious nature, and the mournful dirge of Maneros was nearly related to the Linus of the Greeks.' Wilkinson. ED.

(20, 21.) Alamoth and Sheminith are musical terms, which either signify treble and bass, or some particular tunes, or the construction of the instruments to which the compositions were adapted. SCOTT

(23, 24.) Perhaps Berechiah and Elkanah were stationed on mt. Zion, to open the doors of the tent, when the ark approached to it; and when the singers called on them for admission. (Ps. 24:7—10.) And Obed-edom and Jehiah were afterwards appointed statedly to guard the door of the tent, that none might enter, but according to the law.—The blowing of the trumpets was exclusively the office of the priests. (26.) The Levites offered these sacrifices on their own account, besides those which David offered. (2 Sam. 6:12, 13.) Thus they acknowledged the unmerited goodness of God, in enabling them with safety to perform the service allotted them; probably being conscious, that Uzzah had been smitten, as much through their fault as for his own.—Some think they rested seven times, and offered a bullock and a ram each time. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most zealous and useful reformers have, in all ages, been left to make mistakes, which inferior persons could easily discern; and especially, before their judgments were matured by experience and observation. Satan avails himself of these errors to prejudice the minds of men against their whole character and work: and the artifice readily succeeds with those, who are in quest of some specious pretence, for despising and opposing the humbling truths and the holy service of God. Wise and good men, however, will profit by rebukes; and, upon recollection, they will both justify God in his sharpest corrections, and proceed with their work with greater circumspection. It indeed seems one of the greatest attainments of human nature, to search out, confess, rectify, and profit by, our own mistakes and miscarriages.—When God accepts our persons and our works, makes our hearts joyful in Himself, and renders our services beneficial to his church; we may indeed expect, but need not regard, the scoffs and reproaches of unbelievers: and we must learn to bear them with patience, and to persevere in our compassionate prayers for those, who are thus enemies to their own souls by opposing the cause of God, which we are honored to promote. ric were known apparently long before to the Egyptians, Phœnicians and Babylonians. The form of David's robe is probably seen in the cut, 2 K. 10:22. and that of the ephod, (generally described as of 2 oblong or square pieces, one before and one behind, connected by clasps at the shoulders,) is probably seen in the cut, Gen. 41:42, 43. Among the Egyptians it was worn sometimes white, and very long, flowing majestically in a graceful train. ED.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 4—6. These Levites were appointed 'to record,' or to put the people in remembrance of the wonderful works of God for Israel, as well as to thank Him and praise his name. (Is. 62:6, 7.) Doubtless, David acted as a prophet in regulating this part of divine worship: and his example will not justify uninspired men, in introducing human inventions into the worship of God, and imposing them by their own authority; for when Hezekiah made similar arrangements, he only enforced what David had appointed. (2 Chr. 29:26—28.) Yet it is evident that the other kings of Judah, and Nehemiah after the captivity, in many things commanded and directed the Levites and priests, and even the high priest, in respect of their ministrations; and that when they exercised this authority in religious concerns, according to the Word of God, they were approved and commended for so doing. As this is nowhere enjoined on rulers in the law of Moses; it seems by no means exclusively to belong to that dispensation, but to be the proper improvement of the talents intrusted to them; while an unscriptural exercise of this authority constituted an abuse and perversion of their talents. (2 K. 16.10—16. 2 Chr. 15: 12—19. 29:12, 15, 21—24. 30:12. 31:2—4, 20, 21. 34:20—28. 35:1—9. Neh. 13:7—13, 28—31. Ex. 45:18—25.)—The use of instrumental music in the worship of God was evidently prior to the ceremonial law; and therefore could form no part of it, or be abrogated with it: and though it is not required in the N. T. yet it seems noway inconsistent with it, provided it be suited to the solemnity and seriousness of our religious rejoicing, and so regulated as really to assist the exercise of devout affections. The sad abuses of making, what is called sacred music, [the instrument of undue and unhealthy nervous excitement, or] a matter of mere carnal diversion, with some other subordinate evils of the same kind, form the strongest arguments against it. (Ex. 15:1.)—The trumpets alone were appointed in the law, and had a typical meaning. (Num. 10:2—10. P. O. 1—10.) SCOTT

Psalm 105: 1. and divers others; and the two last verses are from the close of Ps. 106. which, some think, warrants us to do likewise, to make up hymns out of David's psalms, a part of one, and a part of another, put together, so as may be most proper to express and excite the devotion of Christians. These psalms will be best expounded in their proper places, if the Lord will.

When the Levites had finished this psalm of prayer and praise, then, and not till then, the people that attended, signified their consent and concurrence, by saying, Amen. And so they praised the Lord, much affected, no doubt, with this newly instituted way of devotion, hitherto used in the schools of the prophets only, 1 Sam. 10: 5. And if this way of praise please the Lord better than an ox or a bullock, the humble shall see it, and be glad, Ps. 69: 31, 32.

V. 37—43. The worship of God is not only to

Verse 10.

To 'glory in God,' is to value our relation to Him, as our honor and privilege, far above all other distinctions; to make that alone the ground of our confidence and exultation; to account ourselves in this, more happy, more honored, and more favored, than any other people. To 'glory in his holy name,' is to rejoice and exult in his immutable wisdom, justice, truth, and love. (Is. 45:23—25. Jer. 9: 23, 24. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Phil. 3:1—7, v. 3.) And even they, who are only beginning to seek the Lord, may rejoice that He is on a mercy-seat, ready to receive their submissions, to hear their prayers, to forgive their sins, to supply their wants, and to save their souls. (M. R.) SCOTT.

Verse 11.

'Seeking the LORD' implies an earnest and diligent endeavor to obtain the knowledge and favor of God, according to the revelation made of Him in his Word; the renewal of the soul to holiness by his grace, the safety to be enjoyed under his omnipotent protection, and the comfort and support of his Spirit under all trials and temptations, till his strength has perfected the work of his mercy in the full salvation of both body and soul; when present glimpses of his glory, and experience of his love, shall be perfected, by beholding the full display of that glory, and enjoying the full effects of that love, in heaven for ever. (Ps. 14:2, 3. 27:8, 9. Is. 55: 6, 7. Matt. 6: 33, 34. 7: 7—11.)—The gracious aid and protection of JEHOVAH were ensured to Israel, when they sought Him as dwelling between the cherubim above the ark: therefore the ark itself is called 'his strength;' and this implies, that we must 'seek the Lord,' through Christ, and according to the Gospel. (M. R.) ID.

Verses 12, 13.

'The judgments of his mouth,' may either mean, the righteous laws and statutes given to Israel, or the just vengeance God denounced and executed on his enemies, in Egypt, in the wilderness, and in Canaan. (M. R.—Deut. 7:6—8. Is. 41: 8, 9.) ID.

Verses 15—19.

(Ps. 105:8—15, v. 8.) The covenant of JEHOVAH with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, engaged to their posterity the inheritance of Canaan. This was absolute, as a law which required prompt obedience. Their descendants must inherit the land; but, which of their generations, or for how long a time that should be, depended on other circumstances which were declared and stipulated by the Sinai-covenant. (Gen. 17: 4—12. 26:2—5. 28:13—15. Ex. 19:5. 24:6—8. Jer. 31:31—34. Gal. 3: 15—18. Heb. 6:16—20. 8:7—13.)—'What He had first promised to Abraham, and confirmed to Isaac, by a solemn oath, He established to Jacob by an inviolable law, to endure for ever.' Patrick. A thousand generations is a large, definite number taken for an indefinite one; (Deut. 7:9.) and this language was suited to lead the thoughts of pious Israelites, to the eternal inheritance typified by Canaan. The oath, by which the Lord condescended to ratify this engagement, showed the immutability of his counsel, and represented the covenant of grace, as irreversibly confirmed with every true believer.—David called on the people to remember this covenant; that, considering from how small beginnings, through how many and formidable difficulties, and after how many delays, the engagement of the Lord had been fulfilled; they might be animated to praise Him, encouraged to trust Him, and induced to cleave to and obey Him. SCOTT.

Verses 20—22.

(Gen. 20:1—7. 26:11.) The Patriarchs were the Lord's anointed, as believers, prophets, and types and ancestors of Christ; in respect of the Lord's choice of them, his grace to them, and their spiritual consecration to his service; though not externally anointed with oil, that we read of. (M. R.—1 John 2:20—29.) ID.

Verses 25, 26.

The power and majesty, the authority and eternity, the omniscience, omnipresence, and unchangeableness of God, are his greatness: as his justice, wisdom, truth, goodness, and mercy, form his holiness. In both respects He is altogether glorious, and infinitely exceeds the most exalted praises, and even the comprehension, of the noblest c all created intelligences. Thus He is the sole Object of reverential worship, and adoring love and fear. (Ps. 96:5. Jer. 10:6—8, 11—15. Rev. 15:1—4. ID.

Verse 27.

(Ps. 96:6.) Wherever the Lord displays his presence by his works, He shows the glory and honor of his perfections: but, in heaven, where his presence is manifested, in a manner to us inconceivable and ineffable, his glory and honor beam forth on the blessed inhabitants, so as to transform them fully into his holy image of light, purity, and felicity, and to be reflected back in their rapturous unceasing worship and service of Him. This is, in a feeble way, imitated and emulated, 'in his place,' his sanctuary, his church on earth. There his power and beauty are in a measure displayed; and the true believer, beholding in Christ Jesus the glory of the Lord, 'is changed into the same image, from glory to glory, by the Spirit of the Lord;' and thus is both made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, and enjoys the earnests of it. (Ps. 27:4—6. 50:1,2. 63:1—4. 2 Cor. 3: 17, 18.) ID.

1. At Jerusalem, where the ark was, Asaph and his brethren were appointed to attend, to minister before the ark continually, with songs of praise, as every day's work required, v. 37. No sacrifices were offered, nor incense burnt, because the altars were not there; but David's prayers were directed as incense, and the lifting up of his hands as the evening sacrifice, Ps. 141: 2. So early did spiritual worship take place of ceremonial.

2. Yet the ceremonial worship, being of divine institution, must by no means be omitted; therefore at Gibeon were the altars where the priests attended; their work was to sacrifice, and burn incense; which they did continually, morning and evening, according to the law of Moses, v. 39, 40. These must be kept up, because, however in their own nature inferior to the moral services of prayer and praise, yet, as types of the mediation of Christ, they were greatly honored, and their observance was of great consequence. Here Zadok attended, to preside in the service of the

Verses 28, 29.

This is an exhortation to all who then heard, and all who now hear or read it, to 'ascribe to JEHOVAH' the tribute of praise and adoration, which He demands as his due; to allow that all glory belongs to Him, and that all power resides in Him, or is derived from Him; and to render to Him that gratitude, love, and service, which is due to Him from all, as their Creator and hourly Benefactor. (Notes, Ps. 29:1, 2. 96:7—9.) This cannot be withheld without the basest ingratitude.—'All the kindreds of the earth' form but one family, and ought to unite in the service of their common Father. But all had sinned, and fallen under condemnation: yet, through the Redeemer, who was promised from the beginning, all were invited to approach the Lord with their worship and oblations at his sanctuary. This may be called, 'the beauty of holiness,' from the especial presence of the Lord, dwelling above the ark between the cherubim, on the mercy-seat, as Israel's God; as typifying the human nature of Jesus Christ; and representing the believer's heart, now become 'an habitation of God through the Spirit.' When, however, we approach the Father, on a mercy-seat, through the sacrifice and mediation of the Son, and under the influences of the Holy Spirit; then, and then only, do we, in the full meaning of the words, 'worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness.'

Verse 30.

Let all men fear the power, justice, and majesty of God: and learn to worship and obey Him. This would render the moral state of the world as stable and immovable, in as great order and regularity, as is its natural state: and to this the Gospel is suited to bring all who embrace it. (Ps. 75:2, 3. 96:10.) ID.

Verse 31.

Wise, righteous, and good kings, and equitable laws, impartially administered, make prosperous nations; and all good subjects must rejoice in a government of this description. The Lord, who reigns over all, is perfect in his character, law, and administration: this alone would cause universal joy, if all were loyal and obedient; but it speaks terror to the sinner's conscience. Yet, as the Lord reigneth in Jesus Christ on a throne of grace; even sinners, yea, the chief of sinners, may rejoice, when, desirous of forgiveness and reconciliation, they are made humbly willing to become his subjects. SCOTT.

Verses 32, 33.

All the parts of nature are here poetically addressed, by the royal prophet, to join the universal song of joy and praise; in their several ways, to welcome JEHOVAH as the Sovereign of the universe; and to wait the great decisive day, when He will come, as the Savior of his people, to judge the world in righteousness. (Ps. 96:11—13. 98:7—9. 148: Is. 55:12, 13.) Perhaps all the different ranks and descriptions of the human species, who have feared the Lord, and hoped in his mercy, are here intended under figurative expressions. The first coming of Christ likewise, with the calling of the gentiles, and the surprising and most happy change effected by the Gospel, in the moral and religious state of the world, as preparatory to his second coming, seems also to have been predicted. ID.

Verses 34—36.

(Ps. 136:1—3. Jer. 33:10, 11.) Many Israelites, even when David came to the throne, might be dispersed in other nations, by the frequent wars waged with their neighbors. And he prayed that they might be gathered from their dispersions, to join this joyful worship. (Ps. 14:7. 106:47, 48.) Perhaps the Spirit of God, who spake by the Psalmist, intended the gathering of Israel from future and greater dispersions: and it may well be accommodated to the present state of that nation, and our hope of their future calling into the church; as well as to the collecting together of believers from all the nations of the earth, to bless and adore the God of Israel, in and through Christ.—We can scarcely enlarge our thoughts to conceive the effect, which these high praises of God, sung by so vast a multitude, with harmonious elevation of heart and voice, on this joyful occasion, must have produced. It naturally leads us to consider the songs of the redeemed of the Lord in glory; and perhaps we are not, in this world, capable of more just and spiritual ideas of them, than are suggested by this subject, though we may be sure that they are unspeakably more sublime [enlarged] and refined. (Ps. 41:11—13, v. 13. 89:52.) ID.

Verses 37—43.

It seems that these regulations were made and declared, before the people separated, and were continued from that very day. (2 Sam. 6: 20. 1 K. 3:4.) ID.

CHAP. XVII.

David, purposing to build a temple, is encouraged by Nathan, 1, 2. The Lord afterwards, by Nathan, prohibits it: but with many encouraging promises, 3—15. David's prayer and thanksgiving, 16—27.

NOW it came to pass, [a] as David sat in his house, that David said to [b] Nathan the prophet, Lo, [c] I dwell in an house of cedars, but [d] the ark of the covenant of the LORD remaineth [e] under curtains.

2 Then Nathan said unto David, [f] Do all that is in thine heart: [g] for God is with thee.

3 And it came to pass the same night, that [h] the word of God came to Nathan, saying,

4 Go and [i] tell David my servant, Thus saith the LORD, [j] Thou shalt not build me an house to dwell in:

5 For I have not [k] dwelt in an house since the day that I brought up Israel, unto this day; but have * gone [l] from tent to tent, and from one tabernacle to another.

6 Wheresoever I have [m] walked with all Israel, spake I a word to any of [n] the judges of Israel, whom I commanded to [o] feed my people, saying, Why have ye not built me an house of cedars?

7 Now therefore thus shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, [p] I took thee from the sheep-cote, even † from following the sheep, that thou shouldest be [q] ruler over my people Israel:

8 And [r] I have been with thee withersoever thou hast walked, and [s] have cut off all thine enemies from before thee, and have [t] made thee a name like the name of the great men that are in the earth.

9 Also [u] I will ordain a place for my people Israel, and will [x] plant them, and they shall dwell in their place, [y] and shall be moved no more; neither shall [z] the children of wickedness [a] waste them any more, [b] as at the beginning,

10 And [c] since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel. [d] Moreover I will subdue all thine enemies. Furthermore I tell thee, that [e] the LORD will build thee an house.

11 And it shall come to pass, [f] when thy days be expired, that thou must [g] go to be with thy fathers, that [h] I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons; and I will establish his kingdom.

12 [i] He shall build me an house, and [k] I will establish his throne for ever.

13 [l] I will be his Father, and he shall be [m] my son: and [n] I will not take my mercy away from him, [o] as I took it from him that was before thee:

14 But I will settle him [p] in mine house, and in my kingdom for ever: and his throne shall be established for evermore.

altar; as (it is probable) Abiathar settled in Jerusalem, to attend the ark, because he had the breast-plate of judgment, which must be consulted before the ark: this is the reason why we read that in David's time, both Zadok and Abiathar were the priests, 2 Sam. 8: 17. 15: 29. one, where the altar was, and the other, where the ark was. At Gibeon, where the altars were, David also appointed singers to give thanks to the Lord; and the burden of all their songs must be, For his mercy endureth for ever, v. 41. They did it with musical instruments of God; such instruments as were appointed and appropriated to this service, not such as they used on other occasions. Between common mirth, and holy joy, there is a vast difference; and the limits and distances between them must be carefully kept up.

Matters being thus settled, and the affairs of religion put into a happy channel, the people were satisfied, and went home pleased; David returned to bless his house, resolving to keep up his family-worship still, which public worship must not supersede.

CHAP. XVII. This excellent ch. is the same with 2 Sam. 7: It will be worth while to look back on what was there said upon it.

V. 1—15. Let us observe here,

I. How desirous and solicitous good people should be, to serve the interests of God's kingdom in the world, to the utmost of their capacity, v. 1. The concerns of the public should always be near our hearts. What pleasure can we take in our own prosperity, if we see not the good of Jerusalem? When David is advanced to wealth and power, see what his cares and projects are,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Ministers are especially appointed, by the Son of David our King, to animate and assist the people to glorify and rejoice in God, by preaching the Gospel of salvation, and by every other mean in their power.—The streams of mercy, of which we partake, should be traced back to that Fountain of love whence they are derived; and, in thanking the Lord for his benefits to us, and to his church, we should celebrate the glorious excellences of his nature.—Riches, pre-eminence, wisdom, and strength, are precarious blessings, in which we must not glory and rejoice. To know, love, and belong to God constitutes the chief honor and happiness of man. Let us, however, be careful of prematurely concluding, that we are numbered with those, who are interested in his promise of eternal life, by faith in Christ; and seriously appeal herein to conscience and experience. Do we perceive and adore the glory of the divine perfections, and rejoice in celebrating his praise? Do we yield ourselves to his service; depending on his mercy and grace, and lamenting that we love Him no more and serve Him no better? All this, and immensely more, is his due: for He is infinitely great, holy, and good; all our praises are beneath his excellency; and nothing can be compared with his uncreated majesty. Let us then devote all we have and are to Him, and aim to worship Him 'in the beauty of holiness.' Oh, that there were such a heart in us and in all men, as to fear Him and to hope in his mercy; that we might look forward with comfort and exultation to our meeting Him on his awful judgment seat! He is continually collecting, before his throne, that chosen remnant, which the Savior has redeemed from all nations. As we successively depart this life, may our souls be gathered unto them: and may that time speedily arrive, when the scattered Jews shall at length be gathered into the church, and the fulness of the Gentiles brought in, to 'give thanks to his holy name, and to glory in his praise!' Amen, and Amen. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1—6. This ch. almost entirely answers to 2 Sam. 7: [on which see the comment and notes] many minute variations indeed are found; but those only which are more material need here be noticed. (2 Sam. 7:1—7.) Tent to tent, &c. (5) In the wilderness, the ark was taken out of the tent, when the camp of Israel marched; and was returned into it, when they rested.—It was afterwards taken from the tabernacle at Shiloh, and then stationed at Kirjathjearim, doubtless in a tent prepared for it; thence David removed it to another tent on mt. Zion. (16:1—3. 1 Sam. 7:1, 2. 21:1, 2. 2 Sam. 6:10, 11, 17.) SCOTT.

V. 14. [16,17.] In the parallel passage, the Lord says to David, 'thine house, thy kingdom;' here, [16, 17.] 'mine house, &c.' The Lord was Israel's King; and David and Solomon were his vicegerents, as well as types of the Messiah, in whose church and kingdom all these promises and predictions have their grand fulfilment: which shows 'that this principally belonged to the Messiah, of whom David was but a figure.' Patrick. SCOTT. Notes, 2 Sam. 7:15—25, 18, 19. ED.

15 [q] According to all these words, and according to all this vision, so did Nathan speak unto David.

16 ¶ And David the king came and [r] sat before the LORD, and said, [s] Who am I, O LORD God, and [t] what is mine house, [u] that thou hast brought me hitherto?

17 And yet this was [x] a small thing in thine eyes, O God; for [y] thou hast also spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come, and [z] hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree, O LORD God.

18 What can David speak more to thee for [a] the honor of thy servant? for [b] thou knowest thy servant.

19 O LORD, for [c] thy servant's sake, and [d] according to thine own heart, hast thou done all this greatness, in making known all these * great things.

20 O LORD, there is • none like thee, neither is there any God [f] besides thee, [g] according to all that we have heard with our ears.

21 And [h] what one nation in the earth is like thy people Israel, whom God went to [i] redeem to be his own people, to [k] make thee a name of [l] greatness and terribleness, [m] by driving out nations from before thy people, whom thou hast redeemed out of Egypt?

22 For [n] thy people Israel didst thou make thine own people for ever; and thou, LORD, becamest their God.

23 Therefore now, LORD, [o] let the thing that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, be established for ever, and do as thou hast said.

24 Let it even be established, [p] that thy name may be magnified for ever, saying, The LORD of hosts is the God of Israel, even [q] a God to Israel: and let the house of David thy servant be established before thee.

25 For thou, O my God, hast † told thy servant, [r] that thou wilt build him an house: therefore thy servant hath [s] found in his heart to pray before thee.

26 And now, LORD, [t] thou art God, and hast promised this goodness unto thy servant:

27 Now therefore ‡ let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, that it may be before thee for ever: for thou [u] blessest, O LORD, and it shall be blessed for ever.

They that are contriving where to bestow their fruits and their goods, would do well to inquire what condition the ark is in, and whether some may not be well bestowed on it. II. How ready God's prophets should be to encourage every good purpose, v. 2. Ministers should stir up the gifts and graces that are in others, as well as in themselves. III. How little God affects external pomp and splendor in his service. His ark was content with a tabernacle, v. 5. and He never so much as mentioned the building of a house for it; no, not when He had fixed his people in great and goodly cities which they builded not, Deut. 6: 10. He commanded the judges to feed his people, but never bid them build Him a house, v. 6. We may well be content a while with mean accommodations; God's ark was so. IV. How graciously God accepts his people's good purposes, yea, though He Himself prevents their performance.

V. 16—27. We have here David's solemn address to God, in answer to the gracious message he had now received from Him. By faith he receives the promises, embraces them, and is persuaded of them, as the patriarchs, Heb. 11: 13. We shall therefore here observe only those few expressions, in which the prayer here, differs from the record of it in Sam. and has something added.

I. What is there expressed by way of question, (Is this the manner of men, O Lord God?) is here an acknowledgment, 'Thou hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree. Thou hast made me a great man, and then treated me accordingly.' Having Himself distinguished them, He treats them as persons of distinction, according to the quality He has been pleased to put upon them. Some read, 'Thou hast looked upon me in the form of a man, who art in the highest, the Lord God; or, Thou hast made me to see, according to the form of a man, the majesty of the Lord God.' So it points at the Messiah; as Abraham, so David, saw his day, and was glad; and this was it, that God spake concerning his house, for a great while to come, the foresight of which affected him more than any thing. Nor let it be thought strange, David should speak so plainly of the two natures of Christ, who in spirit called Him Lord, though he knew He was to be his Son, Ps. 110: 1. and foresaw Him lower than the angels for a little while, but afterward crowned with glory and honor, Heb. 2: 6, 7.

II. What can David say more unto thee, it is here added, for the honor of thy servant? v. 18. Note, The honor God puts on his servants, by taking them into covenant and communion with Himself, is so great, that they need not, they cannot, desire to be more highly honored: were they to sit down and wish.

III. It is very observable that what in Sam. is said to be for thy word's sake, is here said to be for thy servant's sake, v. 18. Jesus Christ is both the Word of God, Rev. 19: 13. and the Servant of God, Isa. 42: 1. and it is for his sake, on the score of his mediation, that the promises are both made, and made good, to all believers; it is in Him, that they are yea and amen. For his sake it is done, for his sake it is made known; to Him we owe all this greatness, from Him we are to expect all these great things; they are the unsearchable riches of Christ, which, if by faith we see in themselves, and see in the hand of the Lord Jesus, we cannot but magnify as great things, the only true greatness.

IV. The closing words, in Sam. are, With thy blessing let the house of thy servant be blessed for ever. That is the language of a holy desire. But the closing words here, are the language of a most holy faith; For Thou blessest, O Lord, and it shall be blessed for ever, v. 27. God's Word looks at things eternal, and so should our desires and hopes.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The repetitions in the Word of God may be considered, as tacit reproofs of our negligence, forgetfulness, and unteachableness. Indeed, we are very backward to get familiarly acquainted with every part of the sacred volume, and very prone to forget what we have read; so that we need to be taught again what we seem to have already learned: and for all these reasons it is very useful to have the same important truths, precepts, and examples enforced on us, in different parts of the Scriptures. If, in reading any chapter, or hearing any sermon, we learn nothing new; yet are reminded of those things of which we had lost sight, and stirred up to the exercise of faith and holy affections, and to the more diligent, fervent, and delightful practice of our several duties; very important purposes are answered. (2 Pet. 1: 12—15. P. O. 12—18. 3: 1—4.) SCOTT.

Verse 19.

Thy servant's sake.] 'For thy word's sake,' in Sam.—The promise, in fulfilling which God conferred these benefits on David and his race, was first given from love to Him, as a type of Christ, 'his Servant in whom his soul delighteth.' 'He had passed his word to David by his prophets out of his own mere goodness, without any other motive. It may be also thought to signify, for the sake of the Messiah, who is the Word of God, and by way of eminence is called his Servant. Is. 42:1. 49:5.' Patrick. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1. This ch. which is for substance the same, as 2 Sam. 8: has already been commented on. (M. R.) ID.

and took [b] Gath and her towns out of the hand of the Philistines.

2 And [c] he smote Moab; and the Moabites became David's servants, and [d] brought gifts.

3 And David smote [e] Hadarezer king of [f] Zobah unto Hamath, as he went to stablish his dominion [g] by the river Euphrates.

4 And David took from him a thousand chariots, and [h] seven thousand horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen: David also [i] hought all the chariot-horses, but reserved of them [k] an hundred chariots.

5 And when [l] the Syrians of [*] Damascus came [m] to help Hadarezer king of [n] Zobah, David slew of the Syrians two and twenty thousand men.

6 Then David put garrisons in Syria-damascus; and the Syrians [o] became David's servants, and brought gifts. [p] Thus the LORD preserved David whithersoever he went.

7 And David took the [q] shields of gold that were on the servants of Hadarezer, and brought them to Jerusalem.

8 Likewise from [r] Tibhath, and from Chun, cities of Hadarezer, brought David very much brass [s] wherewith Solomon made the brazen sea, and the pillars, and the vessels of brass.

9 ¶ Now when [t] Tou king of Hamath heard how David had smitten all the host of Hadarezer king of Zobah;

10 He sent † Hadoram his son to king David, to ‡ inquire of his welfare, and to § congratulate him, because he had fought against Hadarezer, and smitten him; (for Hadarezer ‖ had war with Tou;) and with him [u] all manner of vessels of gold, and silver, and brass.

11 Them also king David [v] dedicated unto the LORD, with the silver and the gold that he brought from all these nations; from Edom, and from Moab, and from [x] the children of Ammon, and from the Philistines, and from [y] Amalek.

12 [z] Moreover [¶] Abishai the son of Zeruiah [a] slew of the Edomites, in [b] the valley of salt, eighteen thousand.

13 And he put [c] garrisons in Edom; and [d] all the Edomites became David's servants. [e] Thus the LORD preserved David whithersoever he went.

14 ¶ So [f] David reigned over all Israel, and [g] executed judgment and justice among all his people.

15 And [h] Joab the son of Zeruiah was over the host; and [i] Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud [] recorder.

16 And Zadok the son of Ahitub, and [k] Abimelech the son of [l] Abiathar, were the priests; and [m] Shavsha was [] scribe;

17 And [n] Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over the [o] Cherethites and the Pelethites; and the sons of David were chief †† about the king.

CHAP. XIX.

David sends ambassadors to comfort the king of Ammon, who abuses and insults them, 1—5. The Ammonites and Syrians are vanquished by Joab and Abishai, 6—15. The king of Syria sends another army, which David conquers, slaying its commander, 16—18. The Syrians submit to David, 19.

NOW it came to pass [a] after this, that [a] Nahash the king of the children of Ammon died, and his son reigned in his stead.

2 And David said, [b] I will shew kindness unto Hanun the son of Nahash, because his father shewed kindness to me. And David sent messengers to comfort him concerning his father. So the servants of David came into the land of [c] the children of Ammon, to Hanun, to comfort him.

we had an account of in the foregoing ch. Here follows immediately that which one might reasonably expect, an account of his prosperity; for they that seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, as David did, shall have other things added to them, as far as God sees good for them.

V. 1—8. After this, v. 1. i. e. after the sweet communion he had with God by the word and prayer in the foregoing ch. he went on in his work with an extraordinary vigor and courage, conquering, and to conquer. Thus Jacob, after his vision, Gen. 29: 1. We have taken a view of these victories before. Observe,

As the tabernacle was built of the spoils of the Egyptians, so the temple of the spoils of other Gentile nations. A happy presage of the interest the Gentiles should have in the gospel church.

V. 9—17. Here learn,

1. It is our interest to make those our friends, who have the presence of God with them, v. 9, 10. It is in vain to contend with the Son of David: Kiss the Son, therefore, lest He be angry; let the kings and judges of the earth, and all inferior people too, be thus wise, thus instructed. The presents we are to bring Him, are not vessels of gold and silver; (those shall be welcome, who have none such to bring;) but our hearts and sincere affections, our own selves, our whole selves, we must present to Him as living sacrifices.

2. What God blesses us with, we must honor Him with, v. 11. That is most truly and most comfortably our own, which we have consecrated to the Lord, and which we use for his glory. Let our merchandise and our hire be holiness to the Lord, Isa. 23: 18.

3. God gives men power, not that they may look great with it, but that they may do good with it. When David reigned, he executed judgment and justice, and so answered the end of his elevation. Herein he served the purposes of that God who sits in the throne judging right; and was an eminent type of the Messiah, the sceptre of whose kingdom is a right sceptre.

CHAP. XIX. The story is here repeated of David's war with the Ammonites, and the Syrians their allies, and the victories he obtained over them, which we read just as it is here related, 2 Sam. 10. Observe,

V. 1—5. It becomes good people to be neighborly, and especially to be grateful. David will pay respect to Hanun, because he is his neighbor; and religion teaches us to be civil and obliging to all, and to be ready to do all offices of kindness to those we live among; nor must difference in reli-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who 'seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness,' shall, in due time and manner, have all other things added unto them.—Communion with God, and his consolations, are intended to animate us to diligence in our proper work, and vigor in our spiritual warfare.—Earthly possessions are often lost by attempting to establish them: and sinners ruin themselves by encouraging and assisting one another, in rebellion against God, and opposition to his cause.—Our good fight of faith, under the Captain of our salvation, will assuredly terminate in everlasting triumph and peace. But the happiness of Israel, through David's victories and equitable administration, very faintly shadowed forth the felicity of the redeemed in the realms above. (Heb. 12: 2. Matt. 25: 19—23. Rev. 3: 20—22.) Let us then, without delay, join ourselves to Christ, trusting and serving Him constantly and faithfully, that at length we may be for ever with Him.

SCOTT.

Verses 2—8.

Establish his dominion. (3) In Samuel, 'Recover his border.'—Seven thousand. (4) In the parallel passage, 'Seven hundred.' (Notes, 2 Sam. 8:3, 4.)

SCOTT.

3 But [d] the princes of the children of Ammon said to Hanun, * Thinkest thou that [e] David doth honor thy father, that he hath sent comforters unto thee? are not his servants come unto thee for [f] to search, and to overthrow, and to spy out the land?

4 Wherefore Hanun [g] took David's servants, and [h] shaved them, [i] and cut off their garments in the midst, hard by their buttocks, and [k] sent them away.

5 Then there went certain, [l] and told David how the men were served. And he sent to meet them: for the men were greatly ashamed. And the king said, Tarry [m] at Jericho until [n] your beards be grown, and then return.

6 And when the children of Ammon saw that they [o] had made themselves † odious to David, Hanun and the children of Ammon sent [p] a thousand talents of silver, to hire them chariots and horsemen out of Mesopotamia, and out of [q] Syria-maachah, and out of [r] Zobah.

7 So they [s] hired thirty and two thousand chariots, and [t] the king of Maachah and his people; who came and pitched before [u] Medeba. And the children of Ammon gathered themselves together from their cities, and came to battle.

8 And when David heard of it, he sent [x] Joab and all the host of the mighty men.

9 And the children of Ammon came out, and [y] put the battle in array before the gate of the city: and [z] the kings that were come were by themselves in the field.

10 Now [a] when Joab saw that the ‡ battle was [b] set against him before and behind, he chose out of all the § choice of Israel, and put them in array against the Syrians.

11 And the rest of the people he delivered unto the hand of ‖ Abishai his brother, [c] and they set themselves in array against the children of Ammon.

12 And he said, [d] If the Syrians be too strong for me, then thou shalt help me: but if the children of Ammon be too strong for thee, then I will help thee.

13 Be [e] of good courage, and let us behave ourselves valiantly for our people and for the cities of our God: and [f] let the LORD do that which is good in his sight.

14 So Joab, and the people that were with him, drew nigh before the Syrians unto the battle; and [g] they fled before him.

15 And when the children of Ammon saw that the Syrians were fled, [h] they likewise fled before Abishai his brother, and entered into the city. Then Joab came to Jerusalem.

16 ¶ And when the Syrians saw that they were put to the worse before Israel, they sent messengers, [i] and drew forth the Syrians that were beyond the ¶ river: and [k] Shophach the captain of the host of Hadarezer went before them.

17 And it was told David: and he gathered all Israel, and passed over Jordan, and came upon them, [l] and set the battle in array against them. So when David had put the battle in array against the Syrians, they [m] fought with him.

18 But the Syrians [n] fled before Israel; and David slew of the Syrians seven thousand men, which fought in chariots, and forty thousand [o] footmen, and killed Shophach the captain of the host.

19 And when [p] the servants of Hadarezer saw that they were put to the worse before Israel, they made peace with David, and became his servants: neither [q] would the Syrians help the children of Ammon any more.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We may expect, that in this world our kindest actions will often be requited with the basest returns, and our best intentions expose us to the most injurious suspicions. Even in our implicit obedience to our great and gracious Lord, when we most sincerely desire to do good to our fellow creatures, we must lay our account with ingratitude, contempt, and abuse.—In every case, the servants of God, though here disgraced, will finally be honored: but none of his enemies will bring on themselves more sudden and terrible vengeance, than those who insult his ambassadors, when sent with a message of peace and salvation.—When prudence, vigilance courage, and diligence, have been used in a good cause, and we have mutually assisted each other; we may confidently leave the event to the Lord, saying, 'Let Him do what seemeth Him good.' But let us look to ourselves, and examine our hearts and lives, and fear, lest having been instruments of good to others, we should ourselves be found to come short of salvation, through unbelief and impenitent continuance in sin. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 6. Syria-maachah.] Or, Aram-maachah. Maachah (or Maachathi) lay to the E. of Jordan, and had been allotted to Manasseh: but it is probable, the Syrians had got possession of it; and that it was thence called Syria-maachah. (Deut. 3:14. Josh. 12:5.) SCOTT.

Verse 7.

32,000 soldiers, (exclusive of 1000 sent by the king of Maachah,) are mentioned in the parall. pass. (2 Sam. 10.6.) but 32,000 chariots are here stated. (Note, 1 Sam. 13:5.) Either some trivial mistake has crept into the text, in respect of the number or kind of these auxiliaries; or they were used in general to fight, some on foot, and others on horseback; yet on some occasions they all could drive, and fight from chariots of war. SCOTT.

CHAP. XX.

Rabbah is taken and spoiled, and the inhabitants are treated with great severity, 1—3. Three giants are slain by David's servants, in three battles against the Philistines, 4—8.

B. C. 1035. AND [a] it came to pass, that * after the year was expired, at the time that kings go out to battle, Joab led forth the power of the army, and [b] wasted the country of the children of Ammon, and came and besieged [c] Rabbah. But David tarried at Jerusalem. And [d] Joab smote Rabbah, and destroyed it.

2 And David took the crown of their king from off his head, and found † it to weigh a talent of gold, and there were precious stones in it; and it was set upon David's head: [e] and he brought also exceeding much spoil out of the city.

3 And [f] he brought out the people that were in it; and cut them [g] with saws, and with harrows of iron, and with axes. Even so dealt David with all the cities of the children of Ammon. And David and all the people returned to Jerusalem.

B. C. 1018. 4 ¶ And it came to pass after this, that [h] there ‡ arose a war [i] at Gezer with the Philistines; at which time [j] Sibbechai the Hushathite slew [k] Sippai, that was of the children of § the giant: and they were subdued.

5 And there was war again with the Philistines; and Elhanan the son of [l] Jair slew Lahmi, the brother of [m] Goliath the Gittite, whose spear's staff was like a weaver's beam.

6 And yet again there was war at Gath, where was a man ‖ of great stature, whose fingers and toes were four and twenty, six on each hand, and six on each foot: and he also was [n] the son of the giant.

7 But when [o] he  defied Israel, Jonathan the son of [p] Shimea David's brother slew him.

8 These were born unto the giant in Gath; and [q] they fell by the hand of David, and by the hand of his servants.

CHAP. XXI.

David, tempted by Satan, requires Joab to number the people, 1—4. The number is returned to the king, 5, 6. God is displeased, and David owns his fault, 7, 8. The Lord, by Gad the prophet, proposes three judgments to David, who chooses three days' pestilence, 9—13. Seventy thousand are cut off; and David, seeing the destroying angel, intercedes for the people, 14—17. Directed by Gad, he buys Ornan's threshing-floor; and sacrifices: fire consumes the oblation, and the plague is stayed, 18—27. He again sacrifices there, fearing to go unto Gibeon, 28—30.

AND [a] Satan stood up against Israel, and [b] provoked David to number Israel.

2 And David said to [c] Joab and to the rulers of the people, Go, number Israel, from [d] Beer-sheba even to Dan; and [e] bring the number of them to me, [f] that I may know it.

3 And Joab answered,

3. How vain the greatest art and strength are against justice and equity. The Ammonites did their utmost; yet, having a bad cause, and acting in defence of wrong, they were put to the worst. Right will prevail, and triumph at last.

4. To how little purpose is it for those to rally again, and reinforce themselves, that have not God on their side. The Syrians, though no way concerned in the merits of the cause, but serving only as mercenaries, to the Ammonites, when beaten, thought to retrieve their honor; and therefore called in the assistance of the Syrians on the other side Euphrates; but to no purpose, still they fled before Israel, v. 18. they lost 7000 men, who are said to be the men of 700 chariots, 2 Sam. 10: 18. For as now, in a man-of-war for sea-service, they allot ten men to a gun; so then, in land-service, ten men to a chariot.

5. Those who have meddled with strife that belongs not to them, and have found that they meddled to their own hurt, do well to learn wit at length, and meddle no further. The Syrians finding Israel the conquering side, not only brake off their alliance with the Ammonites, v. 19. but made peace with David, and became his servants. Let those who have in vain stood it out against God, be thus wise for themselves, and agree with Him quickly while they are in the way. Let them become his servants; for they cannot but see themselves undone, if they be his enemies.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. How the army of the Ammonites, and their allies, were routed in the field, we read in the foregoing chs. Here we have the destruction of Rabbah, the metropolis of their kingdom, v. 1. the putting of their king's crown on David's head, v. 2. and the great severity used toward the people, v. 3. This we had more fully, 2 Sam. 11, and 12. and cannot but remember how, while Joab was besieging Rabbah, David fell into that great sin, in the matter of Uriah.

But it is observable, that though the rest of the story be repeated, that is not; a hint only is given of it. But David tarried at Jerusalem, and as relating it, is an instance of the impartiality and fidelity of the sacred writers; so avoiding the repetition of it is designed to teach us, that though there may be a just occasion to speak of the faults and miscarriages of others, yet we should not delight in the repetition of them. The persons or actions, we can say no good of, we had best say nothing of.

V. 4—8. The Philistines were nearly subdued, ch. 18: 1. but as in the destruction of the Canaanites by Joshua, the sons of Anak were last subdued, Josh. 11: 21. so here in the conquest of the Philistines, the giants of Gath were last brought down. In the conflicts between grace and corruption, there are some sins, which, like these giants, keep their ground a great while, and are not mastered without much difficulty, and a long struggle; but judgment will be brought forth into victory at last.

Observe, here, We never read of giants among the Israelites, as we do among the Philistines. The growth of God's plants is in usefulness, not in bulk; and in the balance of the sanctuary, David far outweighs Goliath. None are more visibly marked for ruin, than those who reproach God and his Israel, v. 7. Deut. 32: 27. The victories of the Son of David, too, are gradual. We see not yet all things put under Him; but it will be seen shortly: and death itself, the last enemy, like these giants, triumphed over.

CHAP. XXI. As this rehearsal makes no mention of David's sin in the matter of Uriah, so neither of the troubles of his family, that followed upon it; not a word of Absalom's rebellion, or Sheba's. But David's sin, in numbering the people, is here related, because, in the atonement made for that sin, an intimation was given of the spot of ground on which the temple should be built. This awful story we met with, and meditated upon, 2 Sam. 24.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

A pious and benevolent mind cannot possibly delight in mentioning the transgressions of useful and eminent men. So that if truth and candor will permit, and if no good purpose can be answered by speaking, persons of this character will choose to be silent; though they will by no means deny, excuse, or extenuate the sins of any man, when they cannot honestly conceal them. It however proves a malignant or an unfeeling mind, to be always searching into the miscarriages of others, especially those of superior reputation, in the world, or in the church.—The conflicts of believers, like those of David, will be successive, as long as they live here, and sometimes the sharpest are reserved till the last: and their victories will be gradual, as their enemies will still be renewing their assaults, and recovering their strength.—Though the Lord severely correct the sins of his own believing people, He will not leave them in the hands of their enemies.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1. (Note, 2 Sam. 24:1, 2.) God suffered Satan to move David. Here the phrase stood up is to be observed; it was the posture of those who charged or accused any person of a crime, in a court of justice. See 1 K. 22 21. Thus Satan is represented as 'the accuser of the brethren.' in Rev. and here to lay some sin to the charge of the Israelites, which he represented to God as a reason to punish them. For it is the way of the holy Scripture, thus to bring down these things, and accommodate them to the lowest capacities.' Patrick. (Job 1:9—12. Zech. 3:1—4. Rev. 12:7—12.) SCOTT.

Verses 2—6.

Notes, 2 Sam. 24:3, 9.—Why will he be a cause of trespass to Israel? (3) This part of Joab's expostulation with David is not found in Samuel; and it shows, that Joab, amidst all his crimes, had considerable

[g] The LORD make his people an hundred times so many more as they be. but, my lord the king, are they not all my lord's servants? why then doth my lord require this thing? [h] why will he be a cause of trespass to Israel?

4 Nevertheless [i] the king's word prevailed against Joab. [j] Wherefore Joab departed [k] and went throughout all Israel, and came to Jerusalem.

5 And Joab gave the sum of the number of the people unto David. And all they of Israel were [l] a thousand thousand and an hundred thousand men that drew sword: and Judah was four hundred threescore and ten thousand men that drew sword.

6 But [m] Levi and Benjamin counted he not among them: for the king's word was abominable to [n] Joab.

7 * And [o] God was displeased with this thing; therefore [p] he smote Israel.

8 And David said unto God, [q] I have sinned greatly, because I have done this thing: but now, I beseech thee, [r] do away the iniquity of thy servant; for [s] I have done very foolishly.

9 ¶ And the LORD spake unto [t] Gad, David's seer, saying,

10 Go and tell David, saying, Thus saith the LORD, I † offer thee three things: [u] choose thee one of them, [x] that I may do it unto thee.

11 So Gad came to David, and said unto him, Thus saith the LORD; ‡ Choose thee,

12 Either [y] three years' famine; or three months [z] to be destroyed before thy foes, while that the sword of thine enemies overtaketh thee; or else three days [a] the sword of the LORD, [b] even the pestilence, in the land, and [c] the angel of the LORD destroying throughout all the coasts of Israel. [d] Now therefore advise thyself, what word I shall bring again to him that sent me.

13 And David said unto Gad, [e] I am in a great strait: [f] let me fall now into the hand of the LORD; [g] for very § great are his mercies: but [h] let me not fall into the hand of man.

14 ¶ So [i] the LORD sent pestilence upon Israel; and there fell of Israel [j] seventy thousand men.

15 And God sent an angel [k] unto Jerusalem to destroy it: and as he was destroying, the LORD beheld, and he [l] repented him of the evil, and said to the angel that destroyed, [m] It is enough, stay now thine hand. And the angel of the LORD stood by the threshing floor of [n] Ornan the Jebusite.

16 And David lifted up his eyes, and [o] saw the angel of the LORD stand between the earth and the heaven, having a drawn sword in his hand stretched out over Jerusalem. Then David and the elders of Israel, who were [p] clothed in sackcloth, [q] fell upon their faces.

17 And David said unto God, [r] Is it not I that commanded the people to be numbered? even I it is that have sinned and done evil indeed: but as for [s] these sheep, [t] what have they done? [u] Let thine hand, I pray thee, O LORD my God, be on me, and [x] on my father's house: but not on thy people, [y] that they should be plagued.

18 ¶ Then [z] the angel of the LORD commanded

I. How active the tempter was in it, v. 1. It is said, 2 Sam. 24: 1. that the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and He moved David to do it. The righteous judgments of God are to be observed and acknowledged even in the sins and unrighteousness of men. We are sure that God is not the Author of sin, He tempts no man; therefore when it is said that He moved David to do it, it must be explained by what is intimated here, that, for wise and holy ends, He permitted the devil to do it. Here we trace this foul stream to its fountain. That Satan, the enemy of God and all good, should stand up against Israel, is not strange; but, that he should influence David, the man after God's own heart, to do a wrong thing, may well be wondered at. One would think him one of those whom the wicked one touches not. No, even the best saints, till they come to heaven, are forbidden to think themselves out of the reach of Satan's temptations. The devil does us more mischief by tempting us, than by accusing us. He destroys none but by their own hands; and the greatest spite he can do the church of God, is, to tempt the rulers of the church to pride; for none can conceive the fatal consequence of that sin in all, especially in church rulers. Ye shall not be so, Luke 22: 26.

II. How passive the instrument was. Joab was the person employed, an active man in public business; but to this perfectly forced, doing it with the greatest reluctancy imaginable. 1. It was needless. God had promised to multiply them, and David needed not question the accomplishment of that promise: they were all his servants, and he needed not doubt of their loyalty and affection. 2. It was dangerous. In doing it, he might be a cause of trespass to Israel, and might provoke God against them. This Joab apprehended, and yet David himself did not. The most learned in the laws of God, are not always the most quick-sighted in the application of those laws.

Joab was quite weary of it before he had done it; the king's word was abominable to Joab, v. 6. Time was, when whatever king David did, pleased all the people, 2 Sam. 3: 36. But now there was a general disgust at these orders, which confirmed Joab in his dislike of them; so that, though the produce of this muster was really very great, yet he had no heart to perfect it, but left two tribes unnumbered, v. 5, 6. two considerable ones, Levi and Benjamin; and, perhaps, was not very exact in numbering the rest, because he did not do it with any pleasure; which might be one occasion of the difference between the sums here and 2 Sam. 24: 9.

V. 7—17. I. David is here under the rod for numbering the people. Let us briefly observe,

If God's dearest children do amiss, they must

(5.) 'The following method of accounting for the difference of 300,000 between this enumeration and that 2 Sam. 24. from Baruh in Frag. Calm. appears most satisfactory. We learn from 1 Chr. 27. that there was an army of 288,000, who attended the king's orders in a monthly rotation of 24,000 each. These troops added to 12,000, the guards of the princes of the tribes, makes the numbers to agree. In Sam. they are not noticed, being in the actual service of the king. In Chr. they are added; it is there expressly stated that the number is of "all Israel," while in Sam. it is merely said "and Israel were." The difference in the numbers of Judah is explained by the army of 30,000 in the Philistine's country, 2 Sam. 6:1. being included in Sam. but not in Chr. where it may be observed the expression is only "and those of Judah," not "all Judah." Even if we were not aware of any circumstances which would reconcile these and similar differences, they could not justly be deemed contradictory, as we are ignorant of the particulars on which they were founded. The Syriac version reads 800,000 in both places.'

2 Sam. 24:18—25.—Saw, &c. (20) It is probable, this awful vision of the angel, with a 'drawn sword in his hand, stretched out over Jerusalem,' continued apparent to all the inhabitants, till David had offered the appointed sacrifices. The variations in the narrative are noted in the exposition of the parall. pass. in Sam.
ID.

Gad to say to David, [a] that David should go up, and set up an altar unto the LORD, in the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite.

19 And David [b] went up at the saying of Gad, which he spake in the name of the LORD.

20 * And Ornan turned back, and saw the angel; and his four sons with him hid themselves. [c] Now Ornan was threshing wheat.

21 And as David came to Ornan, Ornan looked and saw David, and went out of the threshing floor, and [d] bowed himself to David with his face to the ground.

22 Then David said to Ornan, † Grant me the place of this threshing floor, that I may build an altar therein unto the LORD: [e] thou shalt grant it me for the full price: [f] that the plague may be stayed from the people.

23 And Ornan said unto David, [g] Take it to thee, and let my lord the king do that which is good in his eyes: lo, I give thee [h] the oxen also for burnt-offerings, and the threshing instruments for wood, and the wheat for the meat-offering; I give it all.

24 And king David said to Ornan, [i] Nay, but I will verily buy it for the full price; for I will not take that which is thine for the LORD, nor offer burnt-offerings without cost.

25 So [k] David gave to Ornan for the place six hundred shekels of gold by weight.

26 And David [l] built there an altar unto the LORD, and offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, [m] and called upon the LORD; and he answered him from heaven [n] by fire upon the altar of burnt-offering.

27 And [o] the LORD commanded the angel; and [p] he put up his sword again into the sheath thereof.

28 At that time when David saw that the LORD had answered him in the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite, then he sacrificed there.

29 For [q] the tabernacle of the LORD, which Moses made in the wilderness, and the altar of the burnt-offering, were at that season in the high place at [r] Gibeon.

30 But David could not go before it to inquire of God: for [s] he was afraid, because of the sword of the angel of the LORD.

expect to smart for it.—He is informed that God is displeased; and that is no small uneasiness to so good a man as David, v. 7. God notices, and is displeased with, the sins of his people; and no sin is more displeasing to Him than pride of heart: nor is any thing more humbling, and grieving, and mortifying to a gracious soul, than to see itself under God's displeasure.—For his further humiliation, he is put into a strait, a great strait; and has the terror of three judgments impressed on his mind, no doubt, to his great amazement, while he is considering which he shall choose.—He hears of 70,000 of his subjects, in a few hours, struck dead by the pestilence, v. 14. Justly is that taken from us, weakened, or imbittered to us, which we are proud of. David must have the people numbered, but now God numbers them after another manner; numbers to the sword, Isa. 65: 12. While we lie under the wrath of God, the holy angels are armed against us, though we see them not as David did.

II. How he bore the correction.

1. He made a very penitent confession of his sin, and prayed earnestly for the pardon of it, v. 8. he entreats that however he might be corrected for it, the iniquity of it might be done away. 2. He accepted his punishment of his iniquity; let me be the sufferer, for I am the sinner. 3. He cast himself on the mercy of God; though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him. 4. It went to his heart to see the people plagued for his transgression.

V. 18—30. We have here the controversy concluded, and, on David's repentance, his peace made with God.

1. When David repented him of the sin, God repented Him of the judgment, (v. 15.) and ordered the destroying angel to stay his hand, and sheath his sword, v. 27.

2. The same angel that carried on the war, is here forward in the peace; angels do not desire the woful day. The angel could have given this order about the altar, (v. 18.) to David himself; but he chose to do it by Gad, his seer, that he might honor the prophetical office. Thus the revelation of Jesus Christ was notified by the angel to John, and by him to the churches.

3. David immediately made a bargain with Ornan for the threshing-floor; for he would not serve God at other people's charge. Ornan generously offered it him gratis, not only in complaisance to the king, but because he had himself seen the angel, v. 20. which terrified him and his four sons Those that are duly sensible of the terrors of the Lord, will do all they can, in their places, to promote religion, and use all the methods of reconciliation to turn away God's wrath.

4. God testified his acceptance of David's offerings on this altar, v. 26. To signify that God's anger was turned away from him, the fire that might justly have fastened on the sinner, fastened on the sacrifice, and consumed that, and, on this, the destroying sword was returned into its sheath. Thus Christ was made sin, and a curse, for us, and it pleased the Lord to bruise Him, that through Him God might be to us, not a consuming Fire, but a reconciled Father.

5. He continued to offer his sacrifices on this altar. The brazen altar Moses made, was at Gibeon,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

So long as we abide on earth Satan has access to us, through the remains of sin in our hearts, especially of pride: and the Lord has wise and righteous reasons for permitting this enemy, under certain restrictions, to tempt his servants. As far as he obtains this permission, he is unwearied in his malicious efforts to deceive, to defile, or to distress us; and he can vary his devices in many plausible ways: but he does us more harm as a seducer than as an accuser, as a subtle serpent than as a roaring lion. We are therefore called on to be sober and vigilant, and to pray always that we 'enter not into temptation:' and, as men advance in rank and reputation, authority, or usefulness, they have need to redouble the guard, and to be more watchful and instant in prayer than ever; for the enemy levels his assaults especially against those who are eminent in character, or fill up public stations, in the church or in the community; because their falls involve numbers either in sin or suffering.—It is a mercy to be speedily made sensible of our guilt, when we have been left to transgress: but no confession or humiliation can secure us from present sufferings, when we have committed such crimes, as appear abominable even to ungodly men, and bring an open scandal on our profession.—By thus yielding to temptation we bring ourselves into dreadful straits, from which we can by no means extricate ourselves: yet, even in this case, there is encouragement for us to leave our cause in the hand of the Lord, that He may do with us as He pleases; 'for very great are his mercies.'—Of all the painful consequences of transgression, none in this world can be more distressing to an ingenuous mind, than to see those whom we most love, and desire the most to do good to, suffering heavily through our sins. But even under the anguish of this trial, we must not allow ourselves to murmur, or to despond.—The fear of impending vengeance, from the wrath of an offended God, is naturally calculated to drive men from Him. But, in subserviency to the Gospel, and through the influence of the Spirit of God, it concurs in showing sinners the preciousness of Christ; disposing them to forsake all for Him, and afterwards enlarging the mind in grateful obedience to Him, who has saved them from so great a destruction. CHAP. XXII.

David makes large preparations for the temple, 1—5. He instructs Solomon, and charges him to build it, 6—16. He commands the elders of Israel to assist him, 17—19.

THEN David said, [a] This is the house of the LORD God, [b] and this is the altar of the burnt-offering for Israel.

2 And David commanded to gather together [c] the strangers that were in the land of Israel: and he set [d] masons to hew wrought stones to build the house of God.

3 And David [e] prepared iron in abundance for the nails for the doors of the gates, and for the joinings; and brass in abundance [f] without weight;

4 Also [g] cedar-trees in abundance: for the Zidonians, and they of Tyre brought much cedar-wood to David.

5 And David said, [h] Solomon my son is young and tender, and the house that is to be builded for the LORD must be [i] exceeding magnifical, of fame and of glory throughout all countries: I will therefore now make preparation for it. So [k] David prepared abundantly before his death.

6 Then he called for Solomon his son, and [l] charged him to build an house for the LORD God of Israel.

7 And David said to Solomon, My son, as for me, [m] it was in my mind to build an house [n] unto the name of the LORD my God:

8 But the word of the LORD came to me, saying, [o] Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars: [p] thou shalt not build an house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight.

9 Behold, [q] a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and [r] I will give him rest from all his enemies round about: for his name shall be * Solomon, and [s] I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days.

10 [t] He shall build an house for my name, and [u] he shall be my son, and I will be his father; and [x] I will establish the throne of his kingdom over Israel for ever.

v. 29. and there all the sacrifices of Israel were offered: but David was so terrified at the sight of the sword of the angel, that he could not go thither, v. 30. nor leave the angel, with his sword drawn over Jerusalem, lest the fatal stroke should be given, before he came back.

CHAP. XXII. There is a great difference between the frame of David's spirit in the beginning of the former chapter, and in the beginning of this. There, in the pride of his heart, he was numbering the people; here, in his humility, preparing for the service of God. There, corruption was uppermost; here grace has recovered the upper hand.

V. 1—5. I. Here is, the place for the building of the temple, v. 1; it had pertained to a Jebusite, and, perhaps, there was not a spot of ground besides, in or about Jerusalem, that did so; a happy presage of the setting up of the gospel-temple among the Gentiles. See Acts 15: 16, 17. The ground was a threshing-floor; the church is the corn of God's floor, Isa. 21: 10. Christ's fan is in his hand, thoroughly to purge his floor. This is to be the house, because this is the altar: for its sake the temple was built: there were altars long before there were temples.

II. Preparations for that building; 1. What induced David to make them; (1.) Solomon was young and tender, and not likely to apply himself with any great vigor to this business at first, and might be tempted to put it off; whereas, if he found the materials got ready to his hand, the most difficult part of the work would be over, and it would excite and encourage him to go about it in the beginning of his reign. Note, The aged and experienced, should consider the young and tender, and make the work of God as easy to them as possible. (2.) The house must be exceeding magnificent, very stately, sumptuous, strong and beautiful, every thing about it the best in its kind; as intended for the honor of the great God, the Lord of the whole earth, and a type of Christ; in whom all fulness dwells, and in whom are hid all treasures. Men were then to be taught by sensible methods: the grandeur of the house would help to affect the worshippers, and would invite strangers to come to see it; therefore it is here designed to be of fame and glory throughout all countries. David foretold this good effect of its being magnificent, Ps. 68: 29.

2. His preparation: in general, he prepared abundantly, v. 2—4. Cedar he had from the Tyrians and the Zidonians, The daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift, Ps. 45: 12. He also got workmen together, the strangers in the land of Israel. Some think, because they were generally better artists, and more ingenious in manual operations, than the Israelites; or, rather, because he would not employ the free-born Israelites in any thing that looked mean and servile. They were proselytes to the Jewish religion, who, though not enslaved, yet were not of equal dignity with Israelites.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. When the grace of God possesses the heart, a man's falls and mistakes will eventually be overruled to form him to such a humble and watchful frame of mind, as will exceedingly increase the simplicity, purity, and activity of his zeal in the service of God.—When the Lord refuses to employ us in those kinds and in that measure of service to his church, which we desired and hoped to perform; we must not on that account yield to indolence or discouragement. But we should be doing what we can, in a subordinate sphere, and on a smaller scale; and rejoice in affording any assistance to those who are honored with more extensive usefulness. —We are not likely on earth to witness those glorious times which are foretold in the Scriptures, when Satan shall no more deceive the nations, and 'the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea:' yet, it is possible we may be, as it were, collecting materials for that work. These considerations should encourage us, when grieved that we see no more fruits of all our labors. Much good may appear after our death, which was hidden from us, 'lest we should be exalted above measure.' 'Let us not then be weary of well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.'—Above all, they who are aged, and expect shortly to be removed to a better world, should diligently instruct, encourage, charge, and caution those, who are young and inexperienced, and who are likely to succeed them in their work.—Among other unspeakable advantages of public peace, this is peculiarly important, that it affords the fairest opportunities of executing useful designs to promote true religion: and then, we should be active and earnest to seize the favorable opportunity. (Acts 9: 31.)—But especially peace among Christians is conducive to this most desirable end; which is grievously counteracted by the animosities, divisions, and vehement controversies, which, alas! prevail and are multiplied. Did all real believers 'endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace,' and to strive together for 'the faith of the Gospel:' such effects would follow, as seem at present to exceed our largest expectations or conceptions. (Note and P. O. Eph. 4: 1—6.) The work is, however, in the hands of 'the Prince of peace:' may He compose all our differences, and build the spiritual temple so magnificent and glorious, that the fame of it may be spread into all countries, till all the nations of the earth become his willing subjects, and live in love and peace with each other! SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. David was assured, probably by immediate inspiration, that it was God's will, the temple should be built by Solomon on this very spot.—It does not appear, whether David removed the ark thither with its tent, or whether it remained in its former place.—Henceforth this became the spot, which God 'chose, to place his name there,' and where sacrifices were regularly offered, as long as that dispensation lasted. Verses 6—10.

(Num. 27:18, 19. 2 Tim. 4:1—8.) David was a type of Christ, in his conflicts, victories, and the destruction of his obstinate enemies: but Solomon represented the Savior triumphant, glorified, and giving peace

11 Now, my son, [y] the LORD be with thee; and prosper thou, and build the house of the LORD thy God, as he hath said of thee.

12 Only [z] the LORD give thee wisdom and understanding, and give thee charge concerning Israel, [a] that thou mayest keep the law of the LORD thy God.

13 Then [b] shalt thou prosper, if thou takest heed [c] to fulfil the statutes and judgments, which the LORD charged Moses with concerning Israel: [d] be strong, and of good courage; dread not, nor be dismayed.

14 Now, behold, in my * trouble I have prepared for the house of the LORD [e] an hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver; and of brass and iron [f] without weight; for it is in abundance: timber also and stone have I prepared; and thou mayest add thereto.

15 Moreover there are workmen with thee in abundance, † hewers and workers of stone and timber, and [g] all manner of cunning men for every manner of work.

16 Of [h] the gold, the silver, and the brass, and the iron, there is no number. [i] Arise therefore, and be doing, [k] and the LORD be with thee.

had many things to do, the foundations were all out of course; but Solomon had only one thing in charge, and that was, to build a house for the Lord God of Israel, v. 6. Now, David here instructs Solomon,

I. Why he did not do it himself: God forbade him, because he had shed much blood, v. 8. Some think it refers to the blood of Uriah, but he was forbidden before he had shed that blood: therefore it must be meant, as here explained, of the blood he shed in his wars, which, though shed very justly and honorably, in the service of God and Israel, yet made him unfit to be employed in this service, or rather less fit than one never called to such bloody work. God thus showed how precious human life is to Him, and intended a type of Him who should build the gospel-temple, not by destroying men's lives, but saving them, Luke 9: 56.

II. Why he imposed this task on him. 1. Because God had designed and nominated him to do it, v. 9, 10. Nothing is more powerful to engage us to, and encourage us in, any service for God, than to know that hereunto we are appointed. 2. Because he would have leisure and opportunity to do it, and peace and quietness at home; therefore let him build the house. Where God gives rest, He expects work. 3. Because God had promised to establish his kingdom. God's gracious promises should quicken and invigorate our religious service.

III. He delivers him an account of the vast preparations he had made for this building, v. 14. not in a way of pride or vain-glory, but of encouragement. The treasure here mentioned of 100,000 talents of gold, and 1,000,000 talents of silver, amounts to such an incredible sum, that most interpreters either allow an error in the copy, or think the talent here signifies no more than a plate or piece; ingots we call them. I am inclined to suppose that a certain number is here put for an uncertain, because it is said, v. 16. that of the gold and silver, as well as of the brass and iron, there was no number; and that David here includes all the dedicated things, ch. 18: 11. which he designed for the house of the Lord, i. e. not only for the building of it, but for the treasure of it; and, putting all together, it might come near what is here spoken of. Hundreds and thousands are numbers which we often use to express that which is very much, when yet we would not be understood strictly.

IV. He charges him to keep God's commandments, and heed his duty in every thing, and encourages him, v. 13.

V. He quickens him not to rest in the preparations he had made, but to add thereto, v. 14. Those that enter into the labors of others, and build on their advantages, must still be improving.

Lastly, He prays for him: The Lord give thee wisdom and understanding, and charge concerning Israel, v. 12. Whatever charge we have, if we see God giving it, and calling to it, we may hope He will give us wisdom for the discharge of it. Perhaps Solomon had an eye to this prayer of his father for him, in the prayer he offered for a wise and understanding heart. He concludes, v. 16. Up, and be doing, and the Lord be with thee. Hope of God's presence must not slacken our endeavors. Work out your salvation, and God will work in you.

V. 17—19. David here engages the princes of Israel to assist Solomon. Those that are in the throne, cannot do the good they would, unless those about the throne, set in with them.

1. He shows them what obligations they lay under to be zealous in this matter, in gratitude to God for the great things He had done for them; He had given them victory, rest, a good land, v. 18.

17 ¶ David also commanded [l] all the princes of Israel to help Solomon his son, saying,

18 Is [m] not the LORD your God with you? [n] and hath he not given you rest on every side? for he hath given the inhabitants of the land into mine hand; and the land is subdued [o] before the LORD, and before his people.

19 Now [p] set your heart and your soul to seek the LORD your God; [q] arise therefore, and build ye the sanctuary of the LORD God, [r] to bring the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and the holy vessels of God, into the house that is to be built [s] to the name of the LORD.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11—19. No abilities or diligence can render us durably and extensively useful to others, if we do not take heed to our own conduct, that it be regulated according to the Word of God. —All our advantages, and all the promises of the Gospel, are intended to encourage our activity, and not to excuse our sloth. And, whether we seek our own salvation, or that of other men, we must 'arise, and be doing.'—The whole weight of public services should not be laid on those who sustain public characters. Others are commanded to assist in proportion to their talents and abilities; and the leading persons in congregations should second to the uttermost the labors of the minister for the good of souls: their unanimity, forbearance, and cordiality, their pious examples, family-religion, and earnest prayers, should never be wanting, that they may add weight to his exhortations, strengthen his hands, encourage him in his arduous work, and bring a blessing upon it. Yet, alas! how often is it otherwise! SCOTT.

and felicity to his willing subjects. In this latter character, 'the Prince of peace' erects his spiritual temple; and it more accorded to the nature of the Christian dispensation, and to the character of Jesus, both of which were represented in this transaction, that the temple should be built by a peaceable prince, than by a successful warrior. Yet, David in his wars did the work and sought the honor of God, and was eminently serviceable to his people: and was desirous of building the temple. SCOTT.

For ever. (10) 'This can belong to none in the proper and full sense of the word, but Christ alone. For Solomon reigned but 40 years, and after that his kingdom was torn in pieces. Therefore to Christ the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews applies them, Heb. 1:5.' Patrick. ID.

Verses 11, 12.

David had given Solomon exhortations and instructions; but the powerful influence of divine grace alone could form him to that wisdom, piety, and zeal, which such a work required. ID.

Verse 14.

The gold and silver here mentioned, if computed by the ordinary weight of the talent, would amount to eight or nine hundred millions sterling: and this enormous quantity would have more than sufficed to erect an edifice, as large as the temple itself, apart from its courts, of solid gold and silver. Compared therefore with the size of the temple, and with the gains of Solomon, when the precious metals became common at Jerusalem; (1 K. 9:14, 28.) it is generally concluded, either that some mistake has taken place in the numeral letters, or that a talent of inferior weight and value is meant.—David had collected this wealth for the temple in his trouble, or in his poverty. He had set out in life very poor; he had passed through a constant succession of trials and troubles, not only before he came to the kingdom, but during his whole reign; and all his prosperity was the result of the Lord's singular kindness, in making him a gainer by all the attempts of his numerous enemies.—He seems also to speak of his preparation as a small matter, whether compared with the greatness of the Lord to whom it was dedicated, or with his own obligations to Him. (29:10—19.) SCOTT.

CHAP. XXIII.

David makes Solomon king, 1. The Levites are numbered, and classed for different services, 2—6. The sons of Gershon, 7—11. Of Kohath, 12—20. Of Merari, 21—23. The several officers of the Levites, 24—32.

SO when David was [a] old and full of days, [b] he made Solomon his son king over Israel.

2 And [c] he gathered together all the princes of Israel, with the priests and the Levites.

3 Now [d] the Levites were numbered from the age of thirty years and upward: and their number by their polls, man by man, was [e] thirty and eight thousand.

4 Of which [f] twenty and four thousand were to [*] set forward the work of the house of the LORD; and six thousand were [g] officers and judges.

5 Moreover four thousand were [h] porters; and four thousand [i] praised the LORD with [j] the instruments which I made, said David, to praise therewith.

6 And David [k] divided them into [†] courses among the sons of Levi, namely, [l] Gershon, Kohath, and Merari.

7 ¶ Of the [m] Gershonites were [n] Laadan and Shimei.

8 The sons of Laadan; the chief was [o] Jehiel, and Zetham, and [p] Joel, three.

9 The sons of Shimei; Shelomith, and Haziel, and Haran, three. These were the chief of the fathers of Laadan.

10 And the sons of Shimei were Jahath, [q] Zina, and Jeush, and Beriah. These four were the sons of Shimei.

11 And Jahath was the chief, and [r] Zizah the second: but Jeush and Beriah [‡] had not many sons; therefore they were in one reckoning, according to their father's house.

12 ¶ The [s] sons of Kohath; Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel, four.

13 The [t] sons of Amram; Aaron and Moses: and Aaron was [u] separated, that he should [x] sanctify the most holy things, he and his sons for ever, [y] to burn incense before the LORD, to minister unto him, and [z] to bless in his name for ever.

14 Now concerning Moses [a] the man of God, [b] his sons were named of the tribe of Levi.

15 The sons of Moses were [c] Gershom and Eliezer.

16 Of the sons of Gershom, [d] Shebuel was the chief.

17 And the sons of Eliezer were, Rehabiah [§] the chief. And Eliezer had none other sons; but the sons of Rehabiah [‖] were very many.

18 Of the sons of Izhar, [*] Shelomith the chief.

19 Of the sons of [f] Hebron; Jeriah the first, Amariah the second, Jahaziel the third, and Jekameam the fourth.

20 Of the sons of Uzziel; Micah the first, and Jesiah the second.

21 ¶ The sons of [g] Merari; [h] Mahli and Mushi. The sons of Mahli; Eleazar and Kish.

22 And Eleazar died, and [i] had no sons, but daughters: and their [¶] brethren the sons of Kish [k] took them.

23 The sons of Mushi; Mahli, and Eder, and [l] Jeremoth, three.

The more God has done for us, the more we should study to do for Him.

2. He presses that upon them, which should make them zealous in it, v. 19. Let but the heart be sincerely engaged for God, and the head and hand, the estate and interest, and all, will be cheerfully employed for Him.

CHAP. XXIII. David, having given charge concerning the building of the temple, in this and the following chapters, settles the method of the temple-service, and puts in order its offices. In the late irregular times, and during the wars in the beginning of his reign, we may suppose that though the Levitical ordinances were kept up, yet it was not in the order, nor with the beauty and exactness, that were desirable. Now David, being a prophet, as well as a prince, by divine warrant and direction, set in order the things that were wanting. And in this, he prepared for the temple, as truly as when he laid up gold and silver for it; for the place is of small account, in comparison with the work.

V. 1—23. Here we have,

I. The crown entailed, according to the divine appointment, v. 1. David made Solomon king, not to reign with, or under, but only after him. This he did, 1. When old and full of days. He was but 70 when he died, yet he was full of days, satisfied with living in this world. 2. He did it in a solemn assembly of all the princes of Israel, which made Adonijah's attempt to break in on his title, notwithstanding this public recognition and establishment of it, the more impudent, impious, and ridiculous. Note, The settling and securing of the crown in the interests of the temple, is a great blessing to a people, and a great satisfaction to those who are themselves leaving the world.

II. The Levites numbered, according to the rule in Moses' time, from 30 years old to 50, Num. 4: 2, 3. Their number, in Moses' time, by this rule, was 8580, Num. 4: 47, 48. but now it was increased above four-fold, much more in proportion than the rest of the tribes; for the serviceable men of Levi's tribe, were now 38,000; unless we suppose those above 50 reckoned, here, which was not the case there. Joab had not numbered the Levites, ch. 21: 6. but David now did; not in pride, but for a good purpose, and then he needed not fear wrath for it.

III. The Levites distributed to their respective posts, v. 4, 5. that every hand might be employed, (of all men, an idle Levite makes the worst figure,) and that every part of the work might be carefully done. Now, 1. It was for the honor of God, that so great a number of servants attended his house, and its business. Much of the state of great men consists in the greatness of their retinue. 2. It was the happiness of Israel, that they had among them such a considerable body of men, who were obliged by their office to promote and keep up religion. If the worship of God go to decay in Israel, let it not be said that it was for want of due provision for the support of it, but that they who should have done it, were careless and false.

The work assigned the Levites, was four-fold, (1.) Some, and indeed far the greater number, almost two-thirds, were to set forward the work of the house of the Lord; to attend the priests in killing, slaying, washing, cutting up, and burning the sacrifices; to have the meat-offerings and drink-offerings ready, to carry out dirt, and keep all the vessels and utensils of the temple clean, and every thing in its place, that the service might be performed both with expedition and with exactness. These served 1000 a week, and so went round in 24 courses. Perhaps, while the temple was in building, some of these were employed to set forward that work, to assist the builders, at least, to quicken them, and keep good order among them, and the decorum which became temple-work. (2.) Others were officers and judges, not in the affairs of the temple, (for there, we may suppose, the priests presided,) but in the country; they were magistrates, to give the laws of CHAP. XXIII. V. 2—6. We may suppose that, towards the close of David's reign, the occasional sacrifices were far more numerous than they had been; and it was of importance to make every thing ready for conducting the service, with proportionable splendor and solemnity, as soon as the temple was finished. It does not appear, that such as were above fifty years old (3) were omitted. (24—28. Num. 4:3. 8:24—26.) The priests, who were very numerous, were not included in the sum total here mentioned; so that this tribe [the Levites] had increased in greater proportion than the others.—(M. R.—Note, 2 K. 11:5—9.) Doubtless it was also intended, that the Levites should be instructers of the people, in their several districts, when not employed at the sanctuary. (Num. 35:2—8. 2 Chr. 30:21, 22.)

NOTES.

SCOTT.

Verse 14.

As the sons of Moses were excluded from the priesthood, evidently with Moses' most cordial and disinterested concurrence, and, as it appears from the history, by their own also; no other person, not of Aaron's race, could on any account reasonably think of intruding into that sacred office. (6:48.)

ID.

24 ¶ These were [m] the sons of Levi [n] after the house of their fathers: even the chief of their fathers, as they were counted by number of names [o] by their polls, that did the work for the service of the house of the LORD, from the age of [p] twenty years and upward.

25 For David said, [q] The LORD God of Israel hath given rest unto his people, [r] that they may dwell in Jerusalem for ever;

26 And also unto the Levites: they shall no more [s] carry the tabernacle, nor any vessels of it for the service thereof.

27 For [t] by the last words of David, the Levites were † numbered from twenty years old and above:

28 Because their ‡ office was to wait on the sons of Aaron [u] for the service of the house of the LORD, in the courts, and [v] in the chambers, and in the [x] purifying of all holy things, and the work of the service of the house of God;

29 Both for [y] the shewbread, and for [z] the fine flour for meat-offering, and for the [a] unleavened cakes, and for that which is baked in the §pan, and for that which is fried, and for all manner of [b] measure and size;

30 And to [c] stand [d] every morning to thank and praise the LORD, and likewise at even;

God in charge, to resolve difficulties, and to determine controversies. Of these there were 6000 in the several parts of the kingdom, that assisted the princes and elders of every tribe, in the administration of justice. (3.) Others were porters, to guard all the avenues of the house of God, to examine them that desired entrance, and to resist those that would force an entrance. These were the life-guards of the temple, and, probably, armed accordingly. (4.) Others were singers, and players on instruments, whose business it was to keep up that part of the service; this was a new-erected office.

IV. The Levites mustered, and disposed of into their respective families and kindreds, that an account of them might the better be kept, and those that neglected their duty, might the more easily be discovered, by calling over the roll. When those of the same family were employed together, it would engage them to love and assist one another. When Christ sent forth his disciples two and two, he put together those that were brethren.

That which is most observable in the account of the families of the Levites, is, that the posterity of Moses (that great man) stood on the level with common Levites, while the posterity of Aaron were advanced to the priest's office, v. 13. It is said indeed of the grandson of Moses, Rehabiah, that his sons were highly multiplied, v. 17. margin. When God proposed, if he would let fall his intercession for Israel, He would make of him a great nation, he generously refused it; in recompense for which, his family is here greatly increased, and makes up in number what it wants in figure, in the tribe of Levi. Now, 1. The levelling of Moses' family with the rest, is an evidence of his self-denial: he was no self-seeking man, as appears from his leaving to his children no marks of distinction. 2. The elevation of Aaron's family above the rest, was a recompense for his self-denial in submitting to Moses though his junior, in compliance with the will of God. Those that are content to stoop, are in the fairest way to rise. Before honor is humility.

V. 24—32. Here is,

I. An alteration made in the computation of the effective men of the Levites. In Moses' time, they were not enlisted, or taken into service, till 30 years old, nor admitted as probationers till 25, (Num. 8: 24.) but David, by direction from God, ordered, they should be numbered for the service of the house of the Lord, from 20 and upward, v. 24. This he confirmed by his last words, v. 27. and expressly appointed for ever after; yet not he, but the Lord. This discipline would prevent idleness and dissipation in the young Levites, and promote their reputation, and usefulness. Those that will be eminent, must learn to take care, and take pains, betimes. When the Levites had to carry the tabernacle and its furniture, God would not call any to it till they were come to their full strength; but now there was no more occasion to carry these, the service was much easier, so they might enter on it at 20 years old. Now also Israel were multiplied, and the resort to Jerusalem would be more, when the temple was built, than had ever been to Shiloh, or Nob, or Gibeon; therefore there should be more hands employed in the temple-service, that every Israelite who brought an offering, might find a Levite ready to assist him. When the harvest is plenteous, why should the laborers be few?

II. A further account of the Levites' work. What the priests' work was, we were told, v. 13. That the Levites were not to meddle with, yet they had work enough, and good work, as appointed, v. 4, 5. 1. Those of them that were to set forward the work of the house of God, v. 4. were therein to wait on the sons of Aaron, v. 28. were to do the drudgery, keep the courts and chambers of the house of God clean, set things in their places, and have them ready for use. They were to prepare

31 And to offer all burnt-sacrifices unto the LORD [e] in the sabbaths, in the new-moons, and on the [f] set feasts, by number, according to the order commanded unto them continually before the LORD:

32 And that they should [g] keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the charge of the holy place, and [h] the charge of the sons of Aaron their brethren, in the service of the house of the LORD.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should be thankful, in declining years, to be eclipsed by men of real integrity, piety, and useful endowments, who are coming forward on the stage of action: yet, we should still endeavor to do all we can to promote the common cause of religion; and sometimes the sagacity and experience of old age, when incapable of much bodily exertion, may suggest and effect more real good, than the vigor and activity of youth.—The increase of ministers is of great importance, provided they be men of God, zealous for his glory, and earnestly seeking the salvation of souls. In this case they will desire employment, and in one way or other will be usefully active.—Every method should be used to prevent the irregularity, indolence, and worldly lusts, of this order of men, whose example, influence, and conversation are more useful, or more pernicious, than those of any other; and who are commonly either better or worse employed, than the other orders in society.—Though it is generally inexpedient, that the more arduous part of the sacred ministry should be performed by very young men; yet those intended for this service, ought by no means to waste their youth, but to employ their time in preparatory and initiatory studies and exercises.—A new heart, a spiritual mind, which delights greatly in God's commandments, is the first and most essential qualification for the ministry; as indeed it forms the great distinction between the true Christian, and all other men in the world. To the spiritual man every successive service will yield renewed satisfaction; and he will be unwearied, and always abounding and delighting in the work of the Lord; being never so happy, as when employed for such a good Master, in so pleasant a service. With him the work itself, and the success of his labors, are the principal objects: the emolument or maintenance (though he has a right to it, and perhaps cannot live without it,) is a very subordinate consideration: nor will he much regard whether he be called to take the lead, or whether he keep the charge of others who are placed over him, provided they do not bind his hands, or impede his usefulness. (1 Tim. 3: 1—7. 1 Pet. 5: 1—4.) These are indeed 'men of God:' may He supply his church with numbers of them; in the place of those hirelings, who have in all ages swarmed in the professing church, to the scandal of religion and the ruin of their own souls! SCOTT.

Verse 29.

Honesty is nearly connected with piety; and therefore the Levites, being sufficiently numerous, were employed to superintend the [weights and measures] as well as the [temple-service.] (Deut. 25:13—16. Prov. 11:1. 16:11. 20:10, 23. Am. 8:4—10. Mic. 6:10—15.) They probably kept standard-weights and measures at the temple, by which all those allowed in traffic, were tried and approved: and from this 'the shekel of the sanctuary,' took that name. (Note, [Ex. 37:1, 6, 10, 25.] Ez. 45: 10—12.) SCOTT.

Verses 30—32.

The Levites assisted the priests, in offering the sacrifices; though some parts of that service were performed by the priests alone. (Lev. 1:5—9. Num. 8:19—26. 18:2—6.) ID.

CHAP. XXIV.

The priests are divided by lot into twenty-four courses, 1—19. The rest of the Kohathites, and the Merarites, are divided in like manner, 20—31.

NOW these are [a] the divisions of the sons of Aaron. [b] The sons of Aaron; Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar.

2 But [c] Nadab and Abihu [d] died before their father, and had no children: therefore [e] Eleazar and Ithamar executed the priest's office.

3 And David distributed them, both [f] Zadok of the sons of Eleazar, and [g] Ahimelech of the sons of Ithamar, according to their offices in their service.

4 And there were more [h] chief men found of [i] the sons of Eleazar than of the sons of Ithamar: and thus were they divided. Among the sons of Eleazar there were sixteen chief men of the house of their fathers, and eight among the sons of Ithamar [k] according to the house of their fathers.

5 Thus were [l] they divided by lot, one sort with another; for [m] the governors of the sanctuary, and governors of the house of God, were of the sons of Eleazar, and of the sons of Ithamar.

6 And Shemaiah the son of Nethaneel [n] the scribe, one of the Levites, wrote them before the king, and the princes, and Zadok the priest, and Ahimelech the son of Abiathar, and before the chief of the fathers of the priests and Levites: one * principal household being taken for Eleazar, and one taken for Ithamar.

7 Now the first lot came forth to [o] Jehoiarib, the second [p] to Jedaiah,

8 The third to [q] Harim, the fourth to Seorim,

9 The fifth to Malchijah, the sixth to [r] Mijamin,

10 The seventh to Hakkoz, the eighth to [s] Abijah,

11 The ninth to [t] Jeshuah, the tenth to Shecaniah,

12 The eleventh to [u] Eliashib, the twelth to Jakim,

13 The thirteenth to Huppah, the fourteenth to Jeshebeab,

14 The fifteenth to Bilgah; the sixteenth to [x] Immer,

15 The seventeenth to Hezir, the eighteenth to Aphses.

16 The nineteenth to Pethahiah, the twentieth to Jehezekel,

17 The one and twentieth to Jachin, the two and twentieth to Gamul,

18 The three and twentieth to Delaiah, the four and twentieth to Maaziah.

19 These were [y] the orderings of them in their service, to come into the house of the LORD, according to their manner, [z] under Aaron their father, as the LORD God of Israel had commanded him.

20 ¶ And the rest of the sons of Levi were these: Of the sons of [a] Amram; [b] Shubael: of the sons of Shubael; Jehdeiah.

21 Concerning [c] Rehabiah: of the sons of Rehabiah, the first was [d] Isshiah.

22 Of the [e] Izharites; [f] Shelomoth: of the sons of Shelomoth; Jahath.

23 And the sons of Hebron; [g] Jeriah the first, Amariah the second, Jahaziel the third, Jekameam the fourth.

24 Of the sons of Uzziel, [h] Michah: of the sons of Michah; Shamir.

25 The brother of Michah was [i] Isshiah: of the sons of Isshiah; [k] Zechariah.

26 ¶ The [l] sons of Merari were Mahli and Mushi: the sons of Jaaziah; Beno.

CHAP. XXIV. This ch. gives us a more particular account of the distribution of the priests and Levites into their respective classes, for the more regular discharge of their offices, according to their families.

V. 1—19. The particular account of these establishments is of little use to us now; but when Ezra published it, it was of great use to direct their church affairs, after their return from captivity, into the old channel again. The title of this record we have, v. 1. not divisions of variance, but of distribution, in order to the dividing of their work among themselves; it was a division God made for Himself.

1. It was made for the more regular discharge of their office. God was, and still is, the God of order, not of confusion; particularly in the things of his worship. Number without order is but a clog, and an occasion of tumult; but when every one has, and knows, and keeps, his place and work, the more the better. In the mystical body, every member has its use, for the good of the whole, Rom. 12: 4, 5. 1 Cor. 12: 12.

2. It was made by lot, that it might be of the Lord, and so, all quarrels and contentions be prevented, no man charged with partiality, nor any say they were wronged. As God is the God of order, so He is the God of peace. Solomon says the lot causeth contention to cease.

3. The lot was cast publicly, and with great solemnity, in the presence of the king, princes, and priests, that there might be no room for any fraudulent practices, or the suspicion of them. The lot is an appeal to God, and ought to be managed with corresponding reverence and sincerity. Matthias was chosen to the apostleship by lot, with prayer, Acts 1: 24, 26. and I know not but it might be still used in faith, in parallel cases, as an instituted ordinance. We have here the name of the public notary employed in writing the names, and drawing the lots, v. 6. Shemaiah, one of the Levites.

4. Those priests were chosen to preside in the affairs of the sanctuary, v. 5. in their several courses and turns. What was to be determined by the lot, was only the precedency, who should serve first, and who next, that every one might know his course, and attend in it. Of the 24 chief men of the priests, 16 were of the house of Eleazar, and 8 of Ithamar; for the house of Ithamar might well be supposed to have dwindled since the sentence passed on the family of Eli, who was of that house. The method of drawing the lots, is intimated, v. 6. one chief household being taken for Eleazar, and one for Ithamar. The 16 chief names of Eleazar, were put in one urn, the 8 for Ithamar,

CHAP. XXV. David, having settled the courses of the Levites that were to attend the priests in their ministrations, proceeds, in this ch. to arrange those who were to be singers and musicians in the temple.

V. 1—7. Observe, 1. Singing the praises of God, is here called prophesying, v. 1—3. not that all employed in this service, were honored with the visions of God, or could foretell things to come. Heman indeed is said to be the king's seer in the words of God, v. 5. and the psalms they sang were composed by prophets, and many were prophetical; the edification of the church was intended in it, as well as the glory of God. In Samuel's time, singing the praises of God went by the name of prophesying, 1 Sam. 10: 5. 19: 20. and perhaps that is intended in what Paul calls prophesying, 1 Cor. 11: 4. 14: 24.

II. This is here called a service, and the persons employed in it, workmen, v. 1. Not but that it is the greatest liberty and pleasure to be praising God: what is heaven but that? But it intimates our duty to make a business of it, and stir up all within us to it; and that, in our present state of corruption and infirmity, it will not be done, as it should be done, without labor and struggle. We must take pains with our hearts to bring them, and keep them, to the work.

III. In compliance with the temper of that dispensation, a great variety of musical instruments used, harps, psalteries, symbols, v. 1, 6. and here was one that lifted up the horn, v. 5. that is, used wind-music: those who use such concerts for their own entertainment, should preserve them always free from any thing that savors of immorality or profaneness; by this consideration, time was, when they were sacred; and then they were justly condemned, who brought them into common use: Am. 6: 5.

IV. The glory and honor of God were principally intended in all this temple-music, whether vocal or instrumental, v. 3, 7, 6. This agrees with the intention of perpetuating psalmody in the gospel-church, which is, to make melody with the heart, in conjunction with the voice, unto the Lord, Eph. 5—19.

V. The order of the king is likewise noticed, v. 2, 6. In those matters, indeed, David acted as a prophet; but his taking care for the due and regular observance of divine institutions, both ancient and modern, is an example to all in authority, to use their power to promote religion, and enforce the laws of Christ.* Let them thus be ministers of God, for good.

* Force cannot sway the conscience: and one modern objection to direct penal sanctions for thus 'enforcing the laws of Christ,' (derived from the melancholy records of ecclesiastical tyranny) is, that, when a sect gets the power of a government on its side, it becomes bigoted, domineering, persecuting, corrupt; and thus the true interests of Christ's kingdom suffer. Still, a state whose whole social fabric is founded on belief that there is a God, and that men are accountable to Him, has a right to banish or silence those who teach that there is no God, and no obligation to Him. It is the right of self-preservation. Comp. notes, " p. 36:, vol. I. and on Ex. 20: 7. 13: 49. Ed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Much wisdom and equity is requisite to exclude occasions of envy, jealousy, and contention, in the regulation of public affairs, where numbers are concerned: but what is done fairly and openly, and in the fear of God, is placed on the most permanent basis.—The solemn appointment and orderly attendance of ministers, is of considerable importance; but they are all under the hand of Jesus, from whom they receive their commission and instructions, as well as their qualifications; and to whom they are all accountable.—Difference of age, learning, piety, reputation, and other circumstances, gives external precedency to some ministers; but they are all brethren, and none ought to act as lords, with despotic rule, or domineer over the others. (1 Pet. 5: 1—4. P. O 1—7.) Thus, in Jesus Christ, there is neither male nor female, bond nor free; but all believers are one in Him, being children of God, fellow-heirs of eternal life, and brethren to each other. May they all on earth emulate that love, peace, and harmony, which will subsist in the heavenly world! SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1—6. 'The captains of the host,' (1) seem to mean the leaders, or heads, of the several courses of the priests and Levites.—Jeduthun either was the same person, as was before called Ethan; or Ethan was dead, and Jeduthun succeeded him. (15:17—19, 22.)—The word prophesy, in this place, seems to mean no more, than praising God by singing inspired prophetical hymns, with great earnestness and devout affections, under the influences of the Holy Spirit. As the prophets in Samuel's days used music and singing; it has been conjectured, that he first introduced them into the regular worship of Israel, and that David reduced to order what he found already established. (9:22. 1 Sam. 10:5, 6.)—These persons are said to have 'prophesied according to the order of the king;' because he instituted the order of their services.—Only five sons of Jeduthun are here named; but Shimei, afterwards mentioned, is supposed to have been the sixth. (17) Perhaps, though as Jeduthun's son he was chosen to be the head of one course, he was at this time young, and not fit for present service.—Heman seems to have been a prophet, or 'seer,' in the common

7 So the number of them, with their brethren, that were instructed in the songs of the LORD, even all that were cunning, was two hundred fourscore and eight.

8 ¶ And they [i] cast lots, [j] ward against ward, as well the small as the great, [k] the teacher as the scholar.

9 Now the first lot came forth for Asaph to [l] Joseph: the second to Gedaliah, who with his brethren and sons were twelve:

10 The third to [m] Zaccur, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

11 The fourth to [n] Izri, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

19 The twelfth to [r] Hashabiah, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

20 The thirteenth to [s] Shubael, he his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

21 The fourteenth to Mattithiah, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

22 The fifteenth to Jeremoth, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

23 The sixteenth to Hananiah, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

24 The seventeenth to Joshbekashah, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

25 The eighteenth to Hanani, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

26 The nineteenth to Mallothi, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

27 The twentieth to Eliathah, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

28 The one and twentieth to Hothir, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

29 The two and twentieth to Giddalti, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

30 The three and twentieth to [t] Mahazioth, he, his sons, and his brethren, were twelve:

31 The four and twentieth to Romamti-ezer, he, his sons, and his brethren were twelve.

VI. The fathers presided in this service; Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, v. 1. and the children were under the hands of their father, v. 2, 3, 6. This gives a good example to parents to train up their children, and indeed to all seniors to instruct their juniors, in the service of God, and particularly in praising Him, than which there is no part of our work more necessary, or more worthy to be transmitted to succeeding generations. It gives also an example to the younger to submit themselves to the elder, (whose experience and observation fit them for direction,) and, as far as may be, to do what they do, under their hand. Probably Heman, Asaph, and Jeduthun, were bred up under Samuel, and had their education in the schools of the prophets, which he had founded and presided over. Those that would be eminent, must begin early, and take time to prepare themselves. Solomon perfects what David began, so David what Samuel began. Let all, in their day, do what they can for God and his church; and when they are gone, God can raise up others, to build on their foundation, and bring forth the top stone.

VII. There were others also, beside the sons of these three great men, who are called their brethren, (probably, because they had been wont to join them in their private concerts,) who were instructed in the songs of the Lord, and were cunning or well skilled therein, v. 7. They were all Levites, and in number 288. When David the king was so much addicted to divine poesy and music, many others, all that had a genius for it, applied their studies and endeavors that way. Those do religion great service, that bring its exercises into reputation. Yet these were but a small number in comparison with the 4000 whom David appointed thus to praise the Lord, ch. 23: 5. Probably the rest were divided into as many courses, and were to follow as these led. Or, perhaps, these were for song in the house of the Lord, v. 6. and the rest for the country congregations; though the sacrifices instituted by the hand of Moses, might be offered but at one place, the psalms penned by David, might be sung every where, 1 Tim. 2: 8.

V. 8—31. 24 persons are named in the beginning of this ch. as sons of those three great men, Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun. Ethan was the third, ch. 6: 44. but, probably, dead before the establishment was perfected, and Jeduthun came in his room. Of these three, Providence so ordered it that Asaph had 4 sons, Jeduthun 6, and Heman 14, in all 24, who were named, v. 2—4. who were all qualified for the service, and called to it. The order of their service was determined by lot, to prevent strife for precedency, a sin which most easily besets many otherwise good people.

1. The lot was thrown impartially. They were placed in 24 companies, 12 in a company, in two rows, 12 companies in a row; so they cast lots, ward against ward, putting them all on a level; they did not go according to their age, or their standing, or the degrees they had taken in the music-schools; but it was referred to God, v. 8. Small and great, teachers and scholars, stand alike before God, who goes not according to our rules of distinction and precedency. See Matt. 20: 23.

2. God determined it as He pleased. Let us compare them with the preceding catalogue, and we shall find that, 1. Joseph was the 2nd son of Asaph. 2. Gedaliah, the eldest son of Jeduthun. 3. Zaccur, the eldest of Asaph. 4. Izri, the 2nd of Jeduthun. 5. Nethaniah, the 3d of Asaph. 6. Bukkiah, the eldest of Heman. 7. Jesharelah, the youngest of Asaph. 8. Jeshaiah, the 3d of Jeduthun. 9. Mattaniah, the 2nd of Heman. 10. Shimei, the youngest of Jeduthun. 11. Azareel, the 3d of Heman. 12. Hashabiah, the 4th of Jeduthun. 13. Shubael, the 4th of Heman. 14. Mattithiah, the 5th of Jeduthun. 15. Jerimoth, the 5th of Heman. 16. Hananiah, the 6th. 17. Joshbekashah, the 11th. 18. Hanani, the 7th. 19. Mallothi, the 12th. 20. Eliathah, the 8th. 21. Hothir, the 13th. 22. Giddalti, the 9th. 23. Mahazioth, the 14th. And, lastly, Romamti-ezer, the 10th.

3. Each of these had in his chorus the number of 12, called, their sons and their brethren; because they observed them as sons, and concurred with them as brethren. Probably, twelve, some for the voice, and others for the instrument, made up the concert. Let us learn, with one mind, and one

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord is in Himself exalted far above all blessing and praise, and our obligations to Him are infinite: we ought therefore to give Him thanks, and to praise Him, with our noblest powers; and to render every kind and degree of capacity, ingenuity, or skill, which we possess, subservient to that highest end: but especially our best and most lively affections are his due.—Human prudence must regulate certain circumstances relative to religious worship; and every society, larger or smaller, should order such matters for themselves, to the best of their judgment: but unless the Spirit of God put life and fervor into our devotions, they will, however appointed, be a lifeless, worthless form.—We should all be ready to give or to receive instructions, without self-preference, or accounting ourselves degraded: for in God's sight the teachable scholar is nearly as honorable as the able instructer.—It is pleasant to receive all our temporal and domestic comforts, as given unto us of God, and then to devote them all to his service: and it is a singular mercy to have a large family, all employed and accepted by Him. SCOTT.

Verse 7.

These 288, being 24 courses of 12 each, were more skilful than the other Levites; and being placed under the 24 sons of the chief singers, they had the 4000 before mentioned divided among them, to officiate by courses, according to their instructions. (23:5.) 'Twelve of those singers, with their governor, came and waited every week; at the end of which they were succeeded by other 12, till the course was finished.' Patrick. SCOTT.

The divisions of the porters, 1—12. The gates assigned to them by lot, 13—19. The Levites who had the charge of the treasures, 20—28. Those who were officers and judges, 29—32.

CONCERNING [a] the divisions of [a] the porters: Of the [b] Korhites was [c] Meshelemiah the son of Kore, of the sons of [d] Asaph.

2 And the sons of Meshelemiah were, Zechariah the first-born, Jediael the second, Zebadiah the third, Jathniel the fourth,

3 Elam the fifth, Jehohanan the sixth, Elioenai the seventh.

4 Moreover the sons of [e] Obed-Edom were, Shemaiah, the first-born, Jehozabad the second, Joah the third, and Sacar the fourth, and Nethaneel the fifth,

5 Ammiel the sixth, Issachar the seventh, Peulthai the eighth: for [f] God blessed * him.

6 Also unto Shemaiah his son were sons born, that ruled throughout the house of their father: for they were [g] mighty men of valor.

7 The sons of Shemaiah; Othni, and Rephael, and Obed, Elzabad, whose brethren were strong men, Elihu and Semachiah.

8 All these of the sons of Obed-edom: they and their sons and their brethren, able men for strength for the service, were threescore and two of Obed-edom.

9 And [h] Meshelemiah had sons and brethren, strong men, eighteen.

10 Also [i] Hosah, of the children of Merari, had sons: Simri the chief, (for though he was not the first-born, yet [k] his father made him the chief;)

11 Hilkiah the second, Tebaliah the third, Zechariah the fourth: all the sons and brethren of Hosah were thirteen.

12 Among these were the divisions of the porters, even among the chief men, having [l] wards one against another, to minister in the house of the LORD.

13 ¶ And they cast lots, † as well the small as the great, according to the house of their fathers, for every gate.

14 And the lot eastward fell to [m] Shelemiah. Then for [n] Zechariah his son, a wise counsellor, they cast lots; and his lot came out northward.

15 To Obed-edom southward; and to his sons, the house of ‡ Asuppim.

16 To Shuppim and [o] Hosah the lot came forth westward, with the gate Shallecheth, by the [p] causeway of the going up, [q] ward against ward.

17 [r] Eastward were six Levites, northward four a day, southward four a day, and toward Asuppim two and two.

18 At Parbar westward, four at the causeway, and two at Parbar.

19 These are the divisions of the porters among the sons of [s] Kore, and among the sons of Merari.

20 ¶ And of the Levites, Ahijah was over the [t] treasures of the house of God, and over the treasures of the § dedicated things.

21 As concerning the sons of [u] Laadan; the sons of the Gershonite Laadan, chief fathers, even of Laadan the Gershonite, were [x] Jehieli.

M. R.—Mighty men, &c. (6) Josephus speaks of the gates of the temple being so massy, as to require 20 persons to open or shut them: this too would find employment for the strength of the porters. The temple indeed was not yet built; but David had received from the Lord a pattern of what it was to be, and he arranged every thing with reference to it. (Notes, 28:11—18.)—It is supposed, that the families of the Levites succeeded to the lot of their fathers, whether as singers, porters, or whatever was the service assigned them; and this from one generation to another, without passing from one company to another. Verse 13—18.

Lot eastward, ... northward, &c.] Roberts describes what he supposes a similar method still in use in India, of casting lots for the parts of an inheritance: lines are drawn to the 8 points of the compass from a common centre, and the names of the parties written on a rolled leaf of the Palmirah, and, mingled together, are drawn forth by a child and placed on any point he chooses, and the field lying towards that point is then given to the person whose name was placed on that point. 1. The Levites were employed in the administration of justice, in concurrence with the princes and elders of the several tribes, who could not be supposed to understand the law so well as the Levites, who made it their business to study it. None of those Levites who were employed in the service of the sanctuary, none of the singers or porters, were concerned in this outward business; either one was enough to engage the whole man, or it was presumption to undertake both.

2. Their charge was both in all business of the Lord, and in the service of the king, v. 30, 32. They managed the affairs of the country, as well ecclesiastical as civil, took care both of God's tithes and the king's taxes; punished offences against God and his honor, and those against the government and the public peace; guarded both against idolatry and against injustice; and took care to put the laws in execution against both: so God and the king were well served. It is happy with a kingdom, when its civil and sacred interests are thus interwoven, and jointly minded and advanced.

3. More Levites were employed as judges with the two tribes and a half on the other side Jordan, than with all the rest of the tribes; there were 2700; whereas on the west side of Jordan, there were but 1700, v. 30, 32. Either those remote tribes were not so well furnished as the rest with judges of their own; or because they, lying furthest from Jerusalem, and on the borders of the neighboring nations, were most in danger of being infected with idolatry, and most needed the help of Levites to prevent it. The frontiers must be well guarded.

4. This is said to be done (as were all the fore-

Samuel, &c.] It had been customary from the time of Abraham, (Gen. 14:18—20. 28:20—22.) and probably from the beginning of the world, for persons to dedicate a portion of their gains to the service of God, as an acknowledgment that all came from Him: but it is uncertain whether Samuel, or the other persons here mentioned, had an expectation of a temple being built, for which they desired to make preparation. ID.

Verse 29.

M. R.—Note, 23:2—6.—The outward business, &c.] These Levites seem not to have performed any service within the precincts of the sanctuary: and their employment on that account may be called 'the outward business.' In general, it may be supposed, that, as well as the other Levites, they were expected to be instructers of the people in the law of God: and in particular they were made magistrates of different orders, to administer justice to the people. As the Levites were more numerous, than could be employed in the sanctuary; and as they ought to be, and had opportunities of being, better acquainted with the law than the other Israelites [and understood writing, accounts, &c.]; they were appointed to this service, along with the elders of every tribe. (2 Chr. 19:5—11.) From these, the scribes, lawyers, or doctors of the law, mentioned in the New Testament, seem to have arisen. As the office of the magistracy reaches only to the regulation of the outward conduct; whilst the ministry of the Word forms the means of regulating the mind or judgment, with the conscience and affections of the heart; the former may in this sense also be called the outward business. The lawyers above mentioned made the whole of religion a mere outward business; and they have always had abundance of disciples in this respect. (Matt. 23:25—28. Luke 11:37—41.) ID.

Verses 30—32.

Hebron was first assigned to the priests; (Josh. 21:11, 12.) but it was afterwards occupied by Levites, perhaps as tenants whilst the priests were but few. The Levites here mentioned, it seems, lived there, till they had acquired the name of Hebronites, and then removed over Jordan into the land of Gilead. But being sought out, they were appointed judges, and officers, for various purposes, civil and ecclesiastical, superior and inferior, on each side Jordan, in two divisions: though the larger proportion was assigned to those who lived east of that river; perhaps because, being more remote from the sanctuary and the seat of government, they needed more attention to keep them to their duty, both to God, and to the king. Fortieth year. (31) It is generally thought that most or all of these regulations were made in the last year of David's life: but, though this be uncertain, they were certainly arranged towards the close of his reign. ID.

(32.) Dr. A. Clarke concludes his notes on this ch. in these words. 'Thus courts of ecclesiastical and civil judicature were established in the land; and due care taken to preserve and ensure the peace of the church, and the safety of the state; without which the public welfare would neither be secured nor promoted. Whatever affects religion in any country, must affect the state, or government of that country: true religion alone can dispose men to civil obedience. Therefore it is the interest of every state to protect and encourage religion. It would certainly be ruinous to true religion, to make the state dependent on the church; nor should the church be dependent on the state. Let them mutually support each other; and let the state rule by the laws, and the church live by the Bible.'

Consonant to the train of thought thus suggested is the closing paragraph of a 'Thanksgiving Proclamation' of the Chief Magistrate of Mass. in 1835. 'Let us cherish that fraternal regard for all men, which is inculcated and illustrated in the Gospel. Let us fear to light up the flame of discord and commotion. Let us shun every deviation from right principles, holding fast to law, order and religion; nor, in our prosperity and greatness, neglect to fear and serve the God of our fathers: but let us keep his Sabbaths, and reverence his Sanctuary, lest we also become as those nations whose light is extinct, and whose glory is in the dust.' Would that this abiding sense of national dependence, might be intimately felt; conscientiously and piously acted upon; sincerely, momently, and gratefully acknowledged, throughout the vast length and breadth of our most highly favored land, for ever! PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Wisdom, courage, strength of faith, holy affections, and constancy of mind in our duty, are requisite for every station. But those, who minister in the house of the Lord, and are required, without respect of persons, to prevent the profanation of holy things, have peculiar need of these qualifications. Great integrity, firmness, and discretion, are necessary to do this according to the mind of the great Master of the family, and to prevent abuses, and prostitution of sacred ordinances to secular purposes, by ungodly men. From these sacred treasuries, 'the unsearchable riches of Christ,' all our wants are supplied: but receiving from his fulness, and being victorious over our enemies by his grace, we must give Him the glory, and endeavor to dispose of the whole of our abilities and substance according to his will; allotting a proportion to maintain the expense of his worship, as well as to provide for the poor. Many unbelievers, however, join in these external services, and we must not in any degree rest our hopes of salvation on them.—The work of the minister requires the whole man: internal renovation is immediately its object; and the outward business of external order in society properly belongs to the magistrate. These services are therefore best preserved distinct; yet particular circumstances may warrant exceptions. However, both magistrates and ministers should concur in leading people, by different means, to fear God, and honor the king, and to do justice, and show kindness to their brethren.—It is very wrong for able men to get out of the way, when their help is wanted; but they should be sought out, and set to work: and as our end approaches, we should be more earnest to render our last services to mankind. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1—15. (M. R.—11:10—47. 2 Sam. 23:8—39.) The word translated priest, and applied to Benaiah, evidently means, and should be rendered, ruler, or officer. (M.) SCOTT.

Verses 16—22.

These persons, called 'the princes of the tribes,' (28:1.) seem to have afford, unless on extraordinary occasions, and then they might all be got together quickly. It is the wisdom of governors, and much their praise, while they provide for the public safety, to contrive how to make it effectual, and yet easy, and as little as possible burdensome, to the people.

3. Every course had a commander-in-chief over it, beside the subaltern officers that were rulers over thousands, and hundreds, and fifties; there was one general officer to each course or legion. All these 12 great commanders are mentioned among David's worthies and champions, 2 Sam. 23. and 1 Chr. 11. It is well with a kingdom, when honor thus attends merit. Benaiah is here called a chief priest, v. 5. But cohen signifying both a priest and prince, it might better be translated here, a chief ruler, or, (as in the margin) a principal officer. Dodai had Mikloth, (v. 4.) either for his substitute, when he was absent or infirm, or for his successor when he was dead. Benaiah had his son under him, v. 6. Asahel had his son after him, v. 7. and by that, it seems that this plan of the militia was laid in the beginning of David's reign; for Asahel was killed by Abner, while David reigned in Hebron. When his wars were over, he revived this method, and left the military affairs in this posture, for the peaceable reign of his son Solomon. When we think ourselves most safe, yet, while we are here in the body, we must keep in a readiness for spiritual conflicts.

V. 16—34. We have here an account,

I. Of the princes of the tribes: something of the ancient order instituted by Moses in the wilderness, was still kept up, that every tribe should have its prince or chief. Probably it was kept up all along, either by election or by succession, ruler of the Reubenites was Eliezer the son of Zichri: of the Simeonites, Shephatiah the son of Maachah:

17 Of the Levites, Hashabiah the son of Kemuel: [b] of the Aaronites, Zadok:

18 Of Judah, [c] Elihu, one of the brethren of David: of Issachar, Omri the son of Michael:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The prudent management of secular affairs is conducive to the interests of godliness; provided it be kept in its proper place, and the favor and glory of God have a decided preference. In the kingdoms of this world, habitual readiness for war forms a better security of peace, than any treaties or alliances: in like manner, nothing so much encourages Satan's assaults, as our unwatchfulness; and while we stand armed with 'the whole armor of God,' in the exercise of faith, and preparation of heart for the conflict, we shall certainly be safe, and probably enjoy inward peace.—Usefulness is the proper standard of valuableness: and he who estimates by this rule, will give the Word of God, the salvation of Christ, and true religion, a decided preference to all other things, because infinitely more useful.—Well chosen counsellors prove the wisdom of princes: yet, some will be found wise men and scribes, and eminent for worldly policy and plausibility, who are in fact very [selfish and] wicked characters. But the faithful, the upright, and godly, should be our friends and chosen companions; and no king will be well advised in all things, or in those of the greatest importance, who does not make the testimonies of God 'his delight and his counsellors;' however he may be surrounded by powerful family-connections, faithful friends, and able politicians. SCOTT.

been civil rulers over their sever l tribes, not entirely unlike the lord lieutenants of counties in England.—Gad and Asher are not mentioned, probably because they were joined to the neighboring tribes. Elihu, or Eliab, was David's elder brother. The Levites had a prince, or ruler, as the other tribes had; and the family of Aaron, as distinguished from the rest, had Zadok, for their ruler, or prince. The son of Abner was, probably, advanced on his father's death, as an expression of David's unfeigned concern for that event. (2 Sam. 3:26—39.)

(M. R.) This account mentions only such persons, as filled up needful or useful stations, not any superfluous officers, retained merely to make a show of magnificence. Luxury, ambition, and venality have multiplied these attendants on courts; and selfish opposers will so impede the most unexceptionable measures of government, in limited monarchies, that, without a number of retainers whose interest it is to support the crown, the public business must move heavily, if it could at all proceed. Yet ancient simplicity was preferable to modern refinement; and the useful productions of the earth, to all the devices of luxury and indulgence. (1 K. 4:2—19. 2 Chr. 26:10.)—These officers are called, 'the stewards over all the substance and possessions of the king.' (28:1.) SCOTT.

'Here we see David's personal property consisted, [and such enumerations are common on Egyptian monuments of his and of previous ages] in:—1. Treasures, gold, silver, &c. 2. Goods and grain in castles, cities, villages, and in the fields. 3. Vineyards and their produce. 4. Olive trees, and their produce. 5. Neat cattle, in different districts. 6. Camels and asses; they had no horses. 7. Flocks, sheep, goats, &c. —It is worthy of remark, that Obil, an Ishmaelite, or Arab, was put over the camels, a creature of Arabia; and Jaziz, a Hagarene, (the Hagarenes were shepherds by profession,) was put over the flocks: nothing went by favor; each was appointed to the office for which he was best qualified; and thus men of worth were encouraged, and the public service effectually promoted.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

CHAP. XXVIII.

David assembles the chiefs of Israel; shows them how his purpose of building a temple had been disallowed, and relates the LORD'S special favor to him; and his promises to Solomon, 1—8. He charges Solomon to know and serve God, and to build the temple, 9, 10. He gives a pattern for the form of the several parts, (as God had showed it to him,) and gold and silver for the materials, 11—19. He encourages Solomon with the assurance of help, both from God, and from his people, 20, 21.

AND David [a] assembled all the princes of Israel, [b] the princes of the tribes, and the [c] captains of the companies that ministered to the king by course, and the captains over the thousands, and captains over the hundreds, and [d] the stewards over all the * substance and possessions of the king, † and of his sons, with [e] the ‡ officers, and with [f] the mighty men, and with all the valiant men, unto Jerusalem.

2 Then David the king [g] stood up upon his feet, and said, Hear me, [h] my brethren, and my people: As for me, I had in mine heart to build an house of [k] rest for the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and for [l] the footstool of our God, and [m] had made ready for the building:

3 But God said unto me, [n] Thou shalt not build an house for my name, because thou hast been a man of war, and hast shed § blood.

4 Howbeit the LORD God of Israel [o] chose me before all the house of my father, to be king over Israel for ever: for he hath [p] chosen Judah to be the ruler; and of [q] the house of Judah the house of my father; and [r] among the sons of my father he liked me to make me king over all Israel:

5 And of [s] all my sons, (for the LORD hath given me many sons,) [t] he hath chosen Solomon my son [u] to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the LORD over Israel.

6 And he said unto me, Solomon thy son, [x] he shall build my house and my courts: for [y] I have chosen him to be my son, and I will be his father.

7 Moreover [z] I will establish his kingdom for ever, [a] if he be ‖ constant to do my commandments and my judgments, [b] as at this day.

8 Now therefore [c] in the sight of all Israel the congregation of the LORD, and [d] in the audience of our God, [e] keep and seek for all the commandments of the LORD your God: [f] that ye may possess this good land, and leave it for an inheritance for your children after you for ever.

9 And thou, Solomon my son, [g] know thou [h] the God of thy father, and [i] serve him with a perfect heart, and with [k] a willing mind: for [l] the LORD searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all [m] the imaginations of the thoughts: [n] if thou seek him, he will be found of thee; but [o] if thou forsake him, he will cast thee off for ever.

10 [p] Take heed now; for the LORD hath chosen thee to build an house for the sanctuary: be strong, and do it.

CHAP. XXVIII. The account we have of David's exit, in the beginning of 1 K. does not make his sun near so bright as that given in this and the following ch. where we have his solemn farewell both to his son and his subjects, and must own that he finished well.

V. 1—10. A great deal of service David had done in his day, Acts 13: 36. but now the time draws nigh, that he must die, and, as a type of the Son of David, the nearer he comes to his end, the more busy he is: he is now a little recovered from the bad indisposition mentioned, 1 K. 1: 1. which he improves, as an opportunity of serving God and his country a little more.

I. He summons all the great men to attend him, that he might take leave of them altogether, v. 1. as Moses, Deut. 31: 28. and Joshua, ch. 23: 2. 24: 1. David would not declare the settlement of the crown, but in the presence, and to the satisfaction, of the representatives of the people.

II. He addresses them with great respect and tenderness. His age and infirmities, as well as his dignity, might well have allowed him to keep his seat; but he would show that he was indeed humbled for the pride of his heart, both in the number of his people, and his dominion over them. Then it was too much his pleasure, that they were all his servants, ch. 21: 3. now he calls them his brethren, whom he loved, his people whom he took care of. It becomes superiors thus to speak, with affection and condescension, to inferiors; they will not be the less honored for it, but the more loved. Thus he engages their attention.

III. He declares his purpose to build a temple, and God's disallowing it, v. 2, 3. This he had signified to Solomon before, ch. 22: 7, 8. A house of rest for the ark is here said to be a house of rest for the footstool of our God: for heaven is his throne of glory; the earth, and the most magnificent temples that can be built upon it, are but his footstool. So much difference is there between the manifestations of the divine glory in the upper, and the lower world. Angels surround his throne, Isa. 6: 1. We, poor worms, do but worship at his footstool, Ps. 99: 5. 132: 7. As an evidence of the sincerity of his purpose to build the temple, he tells them that he had made ready for it, but that God would not suffer them to proceed; he must serve the public with the sword, another must do it with the line and plummet. Times of rest are building times, Acts 9: 31.
